Dear General Brad:

Belatedly, my best thanks for sending me the copy of the Senate Staff Study.

When come you again to New York? We have about six hundred ducks on the pond, lots of pheasant and quail, and my Pointer works well despite the hot weather. Do save a week-end for shooting if you can.

As ever yours,

General Omar N. Bradley

Dear General Bradley:

Your letter of July 11 arrived in Mr. Murrow's absence on vacation.

This is merely a note to tell you that I do not expect Mr. Murrow back until early fall, but will be glad to bring your letter to his attention at that time.

Sincerely yours,

Florence Crissan

Dear Ed:

I am enclosing a copy of a Senate Staff Study concerning the horological industry. In view of your broadcast on the watch question, I thought you might be interested in this Senate Report.

I hope you are having a nice summer. I have not been to New York since my class reunion in early June. I expect to go East again late this month and I shall look forward to a chance for us to get together.

With all best regards.

Sincerely,

Brad

ESSENTIALITY OF THE AMERICAN HOROLOGICAL INDUSTRY

INTRODUCTION

On May 22, 1954, Senator Leverett Saltonstall, chairman of the Senate Committee on Armed Services, established this subcommittee to study the essentiality to the Nation's defense of the domestic watch and clock industry. This subcommittee is one of the Preparedness Subcommittees of the Senate Committee on Armed Services. In conducting this investigation we have endeavored to stay within the limits of our charter and to direct our attention to the importance of the products and skills of this industry to the "preparedness" of the United States.

It is elementary that in time of war all things are essential. We have received testimony to the effect that in past wars such things as horse chestnuts and peach kernels were found to be essential. Here we are dealing with a somewhat different problem. We are considering the skills that have transformed an ancient art into a modern craft which, while using mass-production techniques, has retained its unique ability to work in microscopic dimensions and tolerances. We must not only consider the known products of the watch and clockmakers but we must also take into account the yet unimagined developments which only their trained hands and eyes can produce.

Our task has been made easier since all of the witnesses appearing before our committee at hearings held on June 30 and July 1 and 2, 1954, agreed that the horological industry was essential to the Nation's defense. The only demurring voice objected not to the fact of essentiality but to the degree of essentiality. If then we start with the premise that the skills of this craft are essential, it becomes our duty to determine whether they are essential in peacetime and how essential they will be in the event of a future emergency. We will therefore confine ourselves to the degree of importance of these skills, and to consider how important it is for this Nation to keep its watch and clockmakers "in training" for a fight which international communism may force upon us.

One could not examine the facts at close hand, as we have, without being thoroughly impressed that watch and clock making involves the observance of such tolerances on such microscopic work as almost to defy imagination. Training people to work with miscroscopic parts to such accuracy and to fabricate tools which will respect the subminiature measurements, requires periods of apprenticeship seldom heard of in other branches of American industry. In the case of tool and die makers, for example, it requires up to 10 years to attain proficiency in their work. It is apparent that if we need these skills in time of war we must not wait until then to develop them. War, if it should come again, will come without warning. We shall have no opportunity to build up a defense organization as we have been fortunate enough to do in the past. We must be prepared.

THE HISTORICAL IMPORTANCE OF THE WATCH AND CLOCK INDUSTRY TO NATIONAL DEFENSE

To understand the degree of importance of this industry we should first look back at its history. World War I gave evidence that the United States was not able to rely on foreign sources and there was an acute shortage of timepieces and timing devices. Those whose regular business depended on the importation of watches and watch movements found they had to turn to other pursuits while the sources were shut off.

Prior to World War II, Hitler set about to destroy the horological industry of England by subsidizing the German industry and flooding the English market, driving the watch and clock manufacturers of that great country to the wall. As a result of this maneuver the British industry was neutralized and at the beginning of World War II Great Britain had to turn to the United States for help. She remained dependent on foreign imports throughout World War II.

We call to the attention of all the words of Sir Stafford Cripps, to the House of Commons in 1945, when he explained this unfortunate episode in British history:

> * * * when the war came and we needed, naturally, to mobilize all the engineering resources we could muster, the inadequacy of the clock and watch industry left a very serious gap in what may be termed our industrial armor. The services required a great number of clockwork fuses, as well as clocks and watches.
> If we had had a considerable watch and clock industry earlier, not only should we have avoided the risks which are inseparable in such circumstances from dependence on overseas sources, but we should have had a reservoir from which we should have drawn machine tools, skilled labor and management well suited to the manufacture of many of these precision instruments upon which war so much depends today.

Certainly no Member of the Congress of the United States would want to be called upon to explain why an industry vital to the Nation's defense was not preserved.

All of the warning signs have been raised indicating that the domestic watch and clock industry is in a dangerous situation which, if permitted to continue unchecked, would result in the atrophy of skills which we are told we will desperately need in the future as we have in the past. If anything, we are today more dependent on the accuracy of timepieces than we have ever been in our Nation's history. The speeds of planes, ships, trains, and automobiles are ever increasing. Accurate timing and controlling devices will be needed in the future as much if not more than in the past.

During World War II the American watch and clock industry was completely converted to defense production. In addition to the traditional horological instruments which it manufactured for the defense effort, such as chronometers, chronographs, navigation watches, and military timepieces of every description, it also produced unbelievable quantities of time fuses for antiaircraft and artillery shells, timing mechanisms for land and sea mines, altimeters, and a host of other precision instruments for ships, tanks, and aircraft.

The dependence which the United States had on its horological industry in World War II parallels that of any nation which is involved in modern warfare. With the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, our Defense Establishment again looked to the American watch and clock industry to satisfy our urgent demand for large quantities of precision instruments of high quality in the shortest possible time. Again, the horological industry produced.

It has been suggested that the defeat of Japan resulted, in no small degree, from its lack of an effective horological industry. The fact that the Allied forces selected the site of the German jeweled watch industry as a target of prime strategic importance underlines the respect which our own military leaders have for the industry as an indispensable part of a nation's industrial strength.

The experience of the British in finding that "the inadequacy of (their) clock and watch industry left a very serious gap in what may be termed (their) industrial armor" reinforces this opinion.

We must not fail to take advantage of the awful experience of our English friends during World War II. This country cannot depend on an overseas supplier of critical defense materiel. To do so would indeed make us most vulnerable. Were the supply lines from Switzerland closed to us in a period of emergency, we could look to no one else in the family of free nations, as the British were able to look to us in World War II.

We could do no greater service to international Communism than by depriving ourselves of industries such as our domestic horological industry.

THE INDUSTRY—ITS COMPONENTS

The American horological industry consists of four distinct components:

1. Jeweled-watch manufacturers.
2. Pin-lever manufacturers.
3. Clock manufacturers.
4. Manufacturers of component timers.

Necessarily, the greatest degree of precision is required in the manufacture of watch movements. Jeweled watches differ from nonjeweled watches primarily in the use of jewel bearings in the escape mechanism while pin-lever watches use hardened steel pins and bearings. Essentially, the skills necessary to effective production in either segment of the industry are similar, although because of the greater miniaturization and greater use of manual skills in the jeweled-watch industry some techniques indispensable to the manufacture of jeweled watches are not found in the pin-lever watch industry.

Extraordinary tolerances must be respected in the manufacture of clocks and component timers as well, although to a lesser degree than in the manufacture of watch movements. The precision which must be achieved on a mass-production basis even in the manufacture of clocks and other timers, however, is far greater than that required from nonhorological industries.

To demonstrate the difficulties which we would face in establishing a jeweled-watch industry if none were available to us, we may examine the slow, tedious development of the American jeweled-watch manufacturing capability of the Bulova Watch Co. In 1930 Bulova embarked upon a program to manufacture jeweled-watch movements in this country. The Swiss industry at the time permitted Bulova to bring to the United States tools, dies, drawings, and machines. In spite of this cooperation, it was not until shortly after World War II that Bulova was able to manufacture, domestically, all the parts that go into watch movements. Today, even such an accomplishment as this would be impossible due to the fact that since 1934 the Swiss, with an understandable desire to preserve their own industry, have forbidden the export of equipment needed to establish a watchmaking industry.

We cannot overemphasize the long periods required to train key horological personnel, although production people, which constitute approximately 75 percent of the labor forces of the jeweled-watch industry may be trained in from 6 to 12 months. The artisans and supervisory personnel who form the backbone of the industry must have up to 10 years of experience before they are proficient in their skills.

THE INDUSTRY—ITS CAPABILITIES AND UNIQUENESS

It is perhaps improper to classify watchmaking as an industry. Because of the myriad of delicate skills that are involved, it may be best spoken of as craft which designs, engineers, tools, and mass-produces the smallest self-powered machine which man has devised—a machine that combines unparalleled precision and accuracy in dimensions so small that other industries could not possibly match it especially on a mass-production basis.

In peacetime, the industry produces timepieces of all kinds—clocks, watches, as well as scientific timing devices and controls. In time of national emergency the industry has served as an arsenal of sensitive, delicate precision devices needed by the armed services in enormous volume. With rapidly advancing technological developments and with the increasing trend toward more precision, greater miniaturization and increased automation, the skills and facilities of this industry will become increasingly important and vital to the national welfare.

Generations of research, development, and production have produced know-how and skills peculiar to the horological industry. Horology has become a unique science requiring specially trained and highly skilled personnel in engineering, toolmaking, poising, and other technical aspects of design and production. It has no counterpart in modern industry. This background, coupled with a capacity for volume manufacturing, permits the watch and clock maker to convert to precision manufacturing for defense almost immediately when time is of the essence.

Because of their special abilities, watch and clock makers have undertaken numerous research, development, and design problems in the interest of national defense, which have been successfully solved for the military. As Secretary of Defense Charles E. Wilson has indicated, no one can predict what new and yet-undreamed-of military items horologists may be called upon to produce in the future.

Apart from their unique capabilities, the nature of the watchmakers' skills distinguishes them from other manufacturers. The extraordinary dexterity and the almost unbelievable accuracy required of watchmakers will soon be lost unless the skills are exercised on a continual basis. Thus, the "mothballing" approach can have no application to watchmaking. The skills, which deteriorate with disuse, cannot be stockpiled. They can be preserved only in a going industry.

If the industry loses a skilled worker because of the economic difficulties which his employer may experience, he is reluctant to return to his craft because of the fact that he has not only lost confidence in watchmaking as a secure employment, but also gained seniority in another industry which he is unwilling to sacrifice. Even if he does choose to return to his craft, extensive retraining is necessary—up to 3 years in some instances—in order for him to regain the skill needed to work with efficiency on vital microscopic tolerances. Thus, it is apparent that if we are to have a horological industry available to us in time of war, which can rapidly expand and achieve production in high volume, it is absolutely necessary that we have a healthy peacetime base. It must not be forgotten that in peacetime watchmakers have performed and will continue to perform research and development which may result in new precision devices which will greatly increase our defense strength.

THE INDUSTRY—ITS CONDITION

During World War II the American watch- and clock-making industry converted its production 100 percent to defense work. During this period, in which it was producing no clocks or watches for civilian consumption, the industry lost its domestic commercial market to the American importers of Swiss watch movements. Upon the cessation of hostilities in 1946, the industry naturally found it necessary to convert to civilian production, but found it almost impossible to compete with the Swiss. Reconversion was difficult and it was almost 3 years before the domestic industry regained efficient mass production. By this time the importers' hold on the market was strong, and at the present time but 15 percent of the jeweled watches, for example, sold in this country are domestically manufactured. This is the price that the American horological industry has paid for its complete contribution to the national defense during World War II.

We are not here primarily concerned with the financial condition of the domestic industry or any of its components. We have been advised that any of the American companies now manufacturing clock and watch movements, which are unable to make money in doing so, can, and in some cases will, either diversify their operations and make other products, or become, themselves, importers of foreign-made movements which can be cased and merchandised in this country under the long-respected American names.

We are concerned, however, with the continued existence of a healthy horological industry in which the vital skills which we have discussed may be retained, and to which new people will be attracted to learn the ancient watchmaking techniques. Without a continually replenished reservoir of skilled craftsmen, the industry will perish.

Although the economic health of the several components of the industry may be maintained by diversification or by importing, it is clear that only through the continuous manufacture of horological movements can the indispensable labor force be preserved. It thus follows that, even though the industry were engaged entirely in the manufacture of certain devices for the military, which do not require the precision or accuracy that watch movements require, the labor reserve would soon deteriorate and hence be unavailable, at a time of need, to manufacture those precision devices which this industry alone can produce.

Domestic employment in the manufacture of jeweled movements has declined from 8,151 workers in 1951 to 4,300 at the present time.

If this trend continues, it is obvious that the country will soon lose its domestic jeweled-watch industry. In the opinion of the subcommittee, such a loss would be catastrophic.

MILITARY ESSENTIALITY

In seeking an answer as to the degree of essentiality of the horological industry to warwork, Senator John C. Stennis inquired as to whether there were other manufacturers who could produce similar war items such as fuses. Witnesses representing both the Government and the industry pointed out that there were other companies who could make these items provided they were given machinery, time, know-how, and money. At the present time, moreover, there are only 3 companies outside the horological industry producing fuses whereas there were at least 10 or more producing them during the Second World War. Approximately 80 percent of the production in 1953 came from the horological industry.

The story of how peak production of fuses was reached during World War II is found in the statement made to this subcommittee by Mr. Roy T. Hurley, Chairman of the World War II Fuse Integrating Committee, set up as a clearinghouse for the entire fuse program. It permitted intensive specialization by different members of the industry.

It was estimated that the E. Ingraham Co., for example, could produce 10,000 fuses a day. This was inadequate, however, to meet the need. Therefore, this plant concentrated on manufacturing some of the most critical and difficult parts of the fuse because its watchmaking skills and facilities permitted such specialization. With this procedure, 66,000 sets of parts a day were soon rolling off the production line and being shipped for assembly to the Eclipse Division of Bendix Aviation, Eastman Kodak Co., National Cash Register Co., King-Seely Corp., Thomas A. Edison, Inc., Borg Products Division of the George E. Borg Corp., Elgin National Watch Co., Hamilton Watch Co., Waterbury Clock Co. (now United States Time Corp.), and Frankford Arsenal.

The other members of the horological industry also supplied other parts and the nonmembers were able to assemble tremendous quantities of fuses.

Another example of how the horological industry responded to the needs of the military can be cited in the experience of the Hamilton Illinois Watch Co. Prior to World War II, chronometers for ships were handmade and came from Switzerland or England. The Navy could acquire but very few from these sources, so turned to Hamilton Watch Co. with a request that large volume production of this highly complicated mechanism be initiated. From the model supplied by the Navy of a foreign chronometer, the company set up a production line which supplied the Navy on a high-volume-production basis approximately 10,000 chronometers by the end of the war. The company was commended by the Navy in 1945 for its achievement:

> Your company has done a magnificent and unprecedented job on the marine chronometer. The instrument today is superior to the world's finest, which latter took many years to evolve.

The horological industry supplied 3½ billion parts and tools to manufacturers outside its industry during World War II and furnished the military with 25 million completed end items. Although there are many manufacturers in this country who can produce fuses and other precision materiel, given the time, equipment, know-how, and money, their own specialties will be urgently needed by the Government in wartime. The Nation will again look to the watch and clock industry as its immediate and primary source of precision devices.

The record is replete with many, many instances of the military services calling upon the horological industry with urgent requests for production of vital precision devices and instruments which were so badly needed to win a war. Had not the skills of this industry been available our ability to have won World War II would have been seriously impaired. A dissipation and loss of these same skills by allowing this industry to deteriorate would be a blow to national defense in another emergency.

Past experience shows that sound planning for mobilization requires the maintenance of a healthy watch and clock industry. We must not disregard this experience.

MILITARY RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

One of the most important contributions of the horological industry to national defense has been in the research and development work which it has accomplished. There are countless jobs which have been done, but an example of one will suffice for illustrative purposes.

The powder-type fuse used in World War I was found to be unsatisfactory and Army Ordnance, in 1929, decided to procure the drawings and technical know how of a new antiaircraft fuse which had been developed by the Junghans Clock Co. of Schramberg, Germany. The Swiss watchmakers were producing it at this time on an experimental basis for the British Government. A facility at Frankford Arsenal was set up with machinery from Junghans to manufacture this new-type mechanical time fuse. Several German and Swiss horological engineers were hired to run the plant. It took 8 years to produce a sample lot of fuses. During this period the arsenal consulted with and called upon the American horological industry to assist them in overcoming the timing, testing, and production problems.

Shortly after 1938, the job of production was given to the horological industry and the fuse was substantially redesigned and improved in order to increase volume production and to save strategic material. When World War II came, and it was necessary to establish sources for the manufacture of this fuse, other companies were brought into the program. But in order to get them into production satisfactorily, the horological industry had to make hundreds of engineering changes and supply many of the critical parts as well.

Research and development contributions have been made and are currently being made by this industry on the numerous critical military programs: Improvement and standardization of mechanical time fuses; development of electromechanical and electrical time fuses; fuse miniaturization; development of low-temperature lubricants for precision mechanisms; development of timing release mechanisms for instrument parachutes; development of production methods for piezo-electric quartz crystals; development of gear-autosyn units for converter and radio magnetic indicators; research on mass production of jewel bearings and development of domestic sources of jewel bearings; research on aerial cameras; development of new types of timepieces, such as break circuit chronometers, memory chronographs, and underwater watches for Frogmen; redesign and improvement of aircraft clocks; and research and development of gyroscopes, safety and arming mechanisms for many types of guided missiles, including both ground-to-air and air-to-air systems.

The industry is uniquely fitted to carry on research and development work for military items. Its components have unusual, integrated organizations, combining the knowledge of theoretical scientists with the skills of precision engineers and craftsmen.

JEWEL BEARINGS

Jewel bearings are tiny synthetic sapphires or rubies. They are used primarily to provide a surface against which the moving parts of various precision instruments can turn with a minimum of wear or friction. Jewel bearings are indispensable in all types of precision instruments as well as in jeweled watches and timing devices. For example, the instruments in a single bomber require more than 5,000 jewel bearings. Unfortunately, there is no satisfactory substitute for them.

The manufacture of jewel bearings requires painstaking training and skill. The shaping and polishing operations must be done to a tolerance of a millionth of an inch. Such production is uniquely within the capability of jeweled-watch manufacturers.

Before 1940, there were virtually no facilities in this country for the production of jewel bearings. We were dependent almost entirely upon imports from abroad. In June 1941 Germany forbade the Swiss to ship any jewel bearings to the United States. In August our Government designated jewel bearings a critical material. Mr. Arde Bulova, chairman of the board of the Bulova Watch Co., had foreseen a possible emergency and in 1940 undertook a program, in which other jeweled-watch manufacturers later participated, to produce these critical items for defense needs.

It is significant that the watch companies not only were requested to make the bulk of needed bearings, but also furnished the necessary machines, know-how, and training for nonwatch producers.

Imported jewel bearings proved to be a most uncertain source of supply, and from November 1942 to March 1943 no bearings were received from Switzerland.

> The production of instrument jewel bearings is a vital factor in our program for increasing aircraft production. As a result, jewel bearings have been designated 1 of the 35 most critical components of military production for which orders must be placed and scheduled through the entire year (War Production Board letter, April 27, 1943).

It was necessary to turn to the domestic jeweled-watch industry to satisfy the critical needs for these jewel bearings.

During World War II, the defense authorities encountered tremendous difficulty in satisfying their requirements for jewel bearings. A jewel-manufacturing industry was started in this country at great cost and with much effort. The industry was abandoned, however, at the conclusion of the war and reliance was once more placed upon Switzerland to supply these vital items.

Since annual imports from Switzerland average over 100 million pieces, the result is that in respect to its requirements for this strategic article the United States remains in an exceedingly vulnerable position because of its dependence on foreign sources of supply.

Following World War II, jewel bearings were stockpiled. However, with the redesign of instruments and measuring devices, these stockpiled jewels became obsolete for the most part and proved to be useless. When Korea began, this country was not able to use them in any great quantity.

As our technology advances, new designs require new types of jeweling. It is necessary to have a capacity for the production of jewels and only the watch companies can supply the talent necessary for the manufacture of jewel bearings.

Shortly after hostilities broke out in Korea, the Joint Chiefs of Staff decided that it was necessary to reestablish domestic facilities for the manufacture of jewel bearings. To accomplish this, the Air Force gave a contract to Elgin Watch Co. for research and development of improved jewel-bearing machinery. In June 1952, Army Ordnance proposals were requested for the construction and operation of a plant to produce bearings at Rolla, N. Dak. Bulova was awarded the contract to build and operate this plant on a dollar-a-year basis. The present capacity of this plant is 5 million a year—far short of the required 150 million a year necessary to supply both military and civilian users in a period of conflict.

CIVILIAN ESSENTIALITY

Frequently overlooked, in the role which an industry plays in time of war, is the contribution it makes to the wartime civilian economy. We take for granted the timepieces by which our hours and days are measured; we fail to appreciate the confusion and inefficiency which would result if we were deprived of these devices.

During the hearings which the subcommittee held, Assistant Secretary of Commerce Lothair Teetor addressed himself to the importance of the horological industry to the civilian economy in time of war. He stated:

> At no time during past wars has sufficient manufacturing capacity for precision timepieces been available in this country to meet both the demands of the military agencies and the needs of essential civilian and war-supporting industries and institutions. * * *
> Numerous examples can be cited to indicate the hardships, and frequent production losses, engendered by lack of timing devices. Shortage of precision decimal timers for indutrial use was a chronic problem throughout World War II. Military demand for jeweled timers was so great that few could be released for industrial purposes.

Many defense-supporting industries had an urgent, continuing, but inadequately filled demand for timing devices during World War II. There was a persistent shortage of transportation timepieces, communication timepieces, medical timepieces, industrial timers, and timing devices for mining, research and food processing, to mention but a few essential activities which suffered from a deficiency of timing mechanisms.

Secretary Teetor also pointed out:

> Based on World War II experience, and considering postwar population increase and industrial expansion, it is estimated that in a future emergency a minimum of 3 million jeweled timepieces per year would be needed to meet essential nonmilitary requirements.

Because of the complexity of timekeeping instruments and the changing nature of the demand for them, it is impossible to build a stockpile to satisfy the wartime civilian demand. Clocks and watches are perishable—they require complete overhaul after storage if they are to be accurate.

It is the opinion of the subcommittee that the necessity for timing devices with which the civilian community must operate in an emergency period underscores the conclusion that the American horological industry is essential to our national security.

DEPENDENCE UPON IMPORTS

Secretary Teetor stated before this subcommittee:

> In planning for future mobilization, it would seem questionable to place any reliance whatsoever on a foreign source for precision timepieces.

Switzerland, a nation with which this country has had extraordinarily friendly relations throughout our history, is the world's largest manufacturer of precision timepieces. The Swiss industry, as is our own, is capable of producing not only the timing mechanisms upon which a country would depend in time of war, but also innumerable other precision devices which are necessary to a defense machine. Switzerland's traditional neutrality may be preserved in another world crisis, but a Switzerland surrounded by communism would be of little help to us.

We recognize the importance to the Swiss economy of United States sales of Swiss timepieces. We recognize the great employment which is provided by Americans who import and merchandise Swiss movements. We recognize the difficulty in reconciling these interests with the paramount interest of our national security. We believe, however, that both the Swiss manufacturers and the American importers recognize the overriding necessity of a healthy American horological industry, not only to our own national security but to the safety of the free world in the event of further Communist aggression.

EXPERT OPINION

In the study of any involved and complex subject, the opinions of men who, through training and experience, are expert in the subject are most persuasive. The subcommittee is fortunate in that many people who have been intimately associated with overall mobilization planning have addressed themselves to the problem of the importance of the American horological industry. Without exception, these men have concluded that the industry is vital to the Nation's security in time of war. For example, on November 30, 1948, F. C. Elliot, of the National Security Resources Board, stated that upon the basis of NSRB's study and a review of reports made by the War Production Board, the jeweled-watch industry was one of the four most important in this country, from the standpoint of national defense.

In a 1950 letter to the Senate Committee on Finance, Hubert Howard, then Chairman of the Munitions Board, wrote:

> As I pointed out in my prior letter, the maintenance of a healthy watch industry is essential to the national security. In addition to the items which it alone can produce, the industry undoubtedly would be called upon for the production of other items for which it is not the sole producer. In view of this, it is our feeling that, as a matter of precaution against probable future needs, every effort should be made to prevent the dissipation of the productive capacity of the industry and to maintain it in a healthy condition.

Early in 1953, an interdepartmental committee established to study the essentiality of the American watch industry found that the production facilities of the industry were both unique and highly essential. It made several subsidiary findings:

1. The industry is dependent upon a very highly skilled group of designing, engineering, tooling, and supervisory workers and some highly skilled production workers.
2. These skills can be acquired only after long training periods.
3. The number of workers in these categories cannot be rapidly expanded in an emergency.
4. The skilled personnel can be retained during peacetime only to the extent that their skills can be profitably used in commercial production of watch movements.

In a letter to the Chief of Naval Materiel, dated March 19, 1954, Adm. M. F. Schoeffel, Chief, Bureau of Ordnance, said:

While the jeweled-watch industry per se is not the only source of watch- and clock-type movements necessary to the national defense, it is nevertheless considered to be extremely essential in this field in view of its know-how and its ability to make certain essential parts required by the watch and clock industry in general.

* * * it is this Bureau's opinion that insufficient capacity already exists in the watch and clock industry, including the jeweled-watch industry, to meet the national defense M-day requirements * * *.

It is therefore recommended that representatives of the Office of Naval Materiel be fully apprised of this situation in order that higher authority may be in possession of all the facts as to the essentiality of the watch and clock industry, no small part of which is known as the jeweled-watch industry.

Roy T. Hurley, president of Curtiss-Wright Corp. and formerly Chairman of the World War II Ordnance Mechanical Time Fuse Integrating Committee, declared:

* * * I do not believe we would have produced the required quantity and quality of mechanical time fuses if it were not for the American watch and clock manufacturers.

There is no question that their skill and help will be required for national security if we again engage in a major war * * * we must have a strong watch- and clock-manufacturing industry as an essential part of our industry-defense team.

* * * I cannot conceive of this country being dependent upon overseas sources of supply for watches, clocks, jeweled bearings, or precision-time mechanisms in the event of war * * *

Lt. Gen. Levin H. Campbell, Jr., United States Army, retired, Chief of Ordnance during World War II, stated before the Tariff Commission on February 11, 1954:

* * * I would say having the watch and clock industry as a going industry equipped with the necessary plants, the necessary know-how, the trained people it is of very, very great value to this country as a backlog and a safety for a rapid reaching of production * * *

Dr. Arthur S. Flemming, Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, said, in testifying before this subcommittee:

* * * it is an integral part of our defense mobilization base. At the present time, production and employment is below the level that it should be in order to maintain that base in a sound manner.

In speaking of the watch and clock industry as a whole, he said:

* * * there is no question in my mind at all but that the watch industry as a whole is essential to the national security.

He further stated:

* * * past experience has indicated that the skills that are present in this particular industry are skills that we can use very effectively in connection with the production of other items.

It is very difficult to train people to the place where they have those particular skills. And I think it is important not only to keep intact, as far as we can, those who now have those skills, but it is also very important for us to have the kind of industry that will attract younger people into it so that they, in turn, will develop those skills. * * *

* * * if we did not have this industry and did not have this industry in a healthy condition, we would be deliberately penalizing ourselves as a Nation as far as the production of fuses and other timing devices are concerned.

Thomas P. Pike, Assistant Secretary of Defense (Supply and Logistics), Department of Defense, testified that—

All of these (watch and clock) manufacturers are valuable and essential to the Department of Defense * * *

There is no question that the skills involved in these several industries, constituting in its entirety what we call the horological industry, are vitally essential to our national defense in the event of mobilization.

* * * it would be a dangerous thing again from the point of view of national security and defense if any sizable segment of the watch industry or horological industry were to disappear from this country.

In conclusion, I wish to reaffirm the vital essentiality of the horological industry for defense.

Secretary Teetor affirmed before the subcommittee that—

The Department of Commerce, with particular emphasis on its responsibilities for mobilization planning and assuring adequate protection capacity to meet essential civilian needs, supports the position that serious damage would be done to the wartime strength of the United States if our domestic facilities for the manufacture of watches are permitted to deteriorate below the levels determined to be adequate for wartime expansion.

An interest in a more general part of our study was manifested by the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy (the Randall Commission). In its January 1954 report to the President and the Congress, the Commission stated:

Our productive power is our mightiest weapon in war. Defense plants and workers cannot be stockpiled. * * * Industries vital to our defense should be maintained at reserve strength levels.

Although the subcommittee recognizes that it is not bound by the expert opinion which has been offered to it, we feel that we would be remiss in our duties if we failed to give this opinion the weight which its unanimity demands.

SUMMARY

1. The horological industry possesses unique, indispensable skilled workers who require up to 10 years of training and experience before they achieve proficiency in their crafts.
2. These skills can be retained only by continuous application in watch and clock making.
3. Without these skilled workers, the American watch- and clock-manufacturing industry cannot survive.
4. In a period of emergency, the Nation cannot rely on foreign sources for precision timepieces, other precision-timing devices, or jewel bearings.

5. The Nation has historically called upon the horological industry as its sole source of precision timepieces, its immediate and primary source for military precision-timing devices and for the development and production of other miniature and subminiature instruments.

6. Since the horological industry is uniquely capable of producing precision items to the most minute possible tolerances, the Nation will, in another emergency, again call upon the industry as it has in the past.

7. In a period of emergency, there is a military and civilian demand for the products of watch and clock makers which is greater than the supply which existing domestic capacity is able to satisfy.

8. There is a critical shortage of domestic jewel bearing productive capacity.

9. The jeweled-watch industry is uniquely equipped to mass-produce jewel bearings.

10 The jeweled-watch production of the jeweled-watch segment of the American horological industry is presently below a safe mobilization base level.

11. The trend of watch and clock production in the other segments of the industry indicates that it will soon be below a safe mobilization base level.

CONCLUSION

It is axiomatic that in time of national emergency, all components of our industrial machine are essential to the country's defense. American watch and clock makers, however, are peculiarly essential, not only in periods of crisis but, in the considered judgment of the subcommittee, in peacetime as well. Their availability in wartime depends upon a continuous peacetime existence at an operating level which utilizes, to the fullest extent possible, the unique, indispensable skills which the horological industry possesses.

RECOMMENDATION

The subcommittee recommends that the chairman of the Senate Committee on Armed Services transmit this report to the President of the United States and to appropriate officials of the executive branch of the Government for their immediate consideration, in order that the Executive may determine and prescribe effective means for the preservation of the critical skills of the watch- and clock-maker's art.

Dear Ed:

I want to tell you how much I enjoyed the program last Tuesday evening and to express my thanks for permitting me to participate in it. I thought that in general the two sides of the question were well stated; however, I am very disappointed in Mr. Lazarus. He implied that my statement concerning the importation of jeweled bearings was inaccurate, ~~but~~ quoting Charles Taft to the effect that the various instrument companies, - Bendix, Westinghouse, etc., furnished the jeweled instruments for bombers. Of course we know that those instrument companies imported the jeweled bearings, about 99 per cent of which come from Switzerland, but Mr. Lazarus inferred that the instrument companies made these jeweled bearings. I am sorry I did not have the opportunity to set the matter right, and I wonder if there is any way to straighten it out now.

I think that an interesting fact is that during World War II some of the instrument companies named by Lazarus had motorcycles waiting at the plants where the watch companies made jeweled bearings to rush that days production back to their own plants so that they could carry on operations the next day.

It was grand to see you the other day at the Bulova plant. I hope we can get together often when I am back in New York.

Mary joins me in best regards to you and Janet.

Sincerely,

Brad

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Jesse Zousmer telephoned me yesterday and reported that you indicate willingness to interview General Omar Bradley on your evening network radio program.

The General was in touch with our office shortly after I received Jesse's call and informs us that he will be in New York from noon, Monday, October 18th through to the end of that week. He will be available on any day in that period with the exception of Friday, October 22nd.

If you are planning an interview with General Bradley I would appreciate word from you as to a firm air date. And please understand that I stand ready to assist in any way.

STATEMENT BY GENERAL OF THE ARMY OMAR N. BRADLEY BEFORE THE SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE IN SUPPORT OF APPROPRIATIONS, FY 1953

5 May 1952.

Mr. Chairman, and Members of the Committee:

With your permission I will make the first statement. It is based on my own views and does not necessarily represent the views of the other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Service Chiefs will follow and indicate to you the effects of this expenditure limitation, and the appropriation cuts made in the House of Representatives on their respective Services.

When the final Budget Bureau action on the defense budget request for FY 1953 was taken, the Joint Chiefs of Staff believed it to be their duty to advise the Secretary of Defense that they considered the general period of 1954 to be the most dangerous within the foreseeable future for the security of the United States.

Since we made the point about the general period of 1954, I believe it is fair to you, and to the American people to give you as much information on this subject as we can with due regard for military security.

Obviously, our estimates are based on two things; the best intelligence we have concerning the activities and capabilities of potential enemies. Secondly, on our estimate of what protection we can expect from our allies, and our own preparedness.

We realize that with all factors considered, our estimate at best is a considered judgment, rather than a foregone conclusion. It is influenced by the flow of incoming information and is susceptible to the errors inherent to the problem of predetermining the capabilities and actions of a shifty adversary. Because we consider the general period of 1954 to be the most dangerous for the security of the United States does not mean that Soviet Russia will not precipitate World War III tomorrow. Nor does it mean that Soviet Russia will start an attack upon us, or our friends in 1954.

Our judgment does mean, however, that if the present trend of Soviet activities continues, the military considerations which today deter our enemies from war may have lost their deterring effect by the 1954 period. Our enemies will have capabilities of endangering our country -- doing it most critical damage -- at that time.

We would like to prevent them from doing it if possible. If we can't forestall the war, we would like to have the United States in a posture of preparedness that wouldn't find us helpless and knocked out in the first round.

There are many things that must be done between now and the general period of 1954, if we are to maintain our present relative deterrent strength, and to better our chances if war should come. Cutting the present military budget request so that major items of equipment cannot be purchased, or putting another limit on the expenditures we are allowed in the coming Fiscal Year, won't give us this position. As long as the United States and her allies are in a weaker military position than the Soviet Union and her satellites, the danger to our security exists.

The facts, however, would point up a period sometime after mid-1953, all of 1954 and the first part of 1955 as the general period in which the Soviet Union's capabilities versus our own should reach their highest level. Here are my own reasons why I believe the general period of 1954 to be that of greatest danger:

1. RUSSIA'S GROWING ATOMIC CAPABILITY.

In the late summer of 1949, the President announced the Soviet Union's first atomic explosion. If you would like a relative timetable, consider our own atomic capabilities between 1945, when we held the first test explosion in the New Mexico desert, and five years later, 1950.

When you consider that the Russians gained considerable research knowledge from German experiments, and German scientists, and add to this the knowledge she gained from the Fuchs betrayal, you can see that the Soviet Union atomic progress, with all the knowledge that she has gained by these methods, should be faster than our own progress in our first five year period. I have cited this only as an example of what we might expect.

2. THE GROWING STRENGTH OF THE WEST POINTS TO '54.

It has become common international knowledge that our plans for the defense of the North Atlantic community have had 1954 as their target for minimum needed readiness. Fourteen nations are working toward this goal. At Lisbon, these nations pledged themselves to carry out the first big step -- the 1952 step -- in this build-up of our military forces.

It does not take more than common sense in the Kremlin to know that if this succeeds -- or even partly succeeds -- the chance of anyone overrunning Europe begins to decrease. And when our collective defense is assured -- they may not want to risk war with the West. If they have the intention of going to war -- and they have stated that war with the free nations is inevitable in their theory -- then they would logically do everything in their power to slow down our readiness, and might decide to strike before we are strong.

This present expenditure limitation, and the cuts in our own budget, and in the Mutual Security appropriations slow down our readiness.

The other factor -- when they should strike to do us maximum damage -- brings up this question: Does the steady increase of strength from our own defense efforts, then, tend to invite an early attack by the Soviets? The answer is probably "yes". But it is better to accept this risk of attack to obtain a real increase in allied strength. Otherwise, we are in danger of offering them Western Europe, and ultimately the United States, on a platter.

3. THE STATUS OF SOVIET UNION MILITARY EQUIPMENT.

This may seem a minor point. But it is an established fact that military equipment begins to deteriorate when it is six to ten years old.

The Soviet Union ended World War II but did not demobilize her forces. Actually, she maintained an inordinately high war production -- about 65% of her national production -- for two years after the war, 1946 and 1947. Then she cut back, but continued to devote 15 to 20 percent of her national production to war materials.

Adding an average of eight years to this, you have the years of 1954, 1955. In other words, if a sizeable portion of the war materials that she produced in 1946 to 1947 are to be used in battle, rather than scrapped -- and remember she has a great deal of money and material tied up in this -- then she will have to use them in 1954 and 1955.

4. RUSSIA'S INDUSTRIAL CAPACITY.

Apart from our superior atomic capabilities, here is perhaps one of the reasons why Soviet Russia has not attacked before this. It is the effort she has had to make to rebuild her industries, and relocate a sizeable part of them in the less vulnerable area, behind the Urals. This rebuilding and increasing of her industrial capacity has been going on for years now. There are indications that she is reaching the point where she can meet some of the great pressures on her for trade commodities, which in turn will satisfy her needs for strategic materials to increase her armaments production.

Obviously, a satisfactory strategic stockpile is one condition a nation must reach before she can risk a sustained conflict. Every indication shows that she is reaching that stage, both from a basis of industrial capacity and industrial location.

Therefore, in 1953, and 1954, much of this self-deterrent that has held her back will be removed, and will no longer be a factor in our favor.

5. MODERNIZATION OF SOVIET UNION AND SATELLITE FORCES.

From time to time, the Department of Defense has presented to your committees in Congress an intelligence summary of the military strength of the Soviet Union and her satellites. You have perhaps noticed that the number of active divisions has remained the same, and the total number of aircraft has remained practically the same for a period of two or three years. Some may have deduced that this was an indication of no intention to make war, and no improved capability for making war.

Actually, there have been great improvements in the readiness of the Soviet forces. For one thing, the fact that they have maintained approximately the same figures in air and ground strength for that many years is a readiness factor. Supposing that we had kept just 50 divisions active and in training constantly since 1946, instead of this up-and-down demobilization, re-mobilization, and demobilization? Constancy of effort is an indication of improved readiness in itself.

But in addition to that, our best intelligence indicates that the Soviet Union has been improving her armed forces as fast as she could. They have improved their mobility and their firepower by more modern equipment.

In the Air arm, for one outstanding example, the Soviet Union has continuously been producing jet aircraft to replace World War II models. While we have been using up our World War II aircraft out of storage to meet our needs -- and to meet some of our Korean war needs - the Soviet Union has been producing jet aircraft fast enough to meet the Chinese communist needs, and at the same time to expand rapidly the jet components of the Soviet Air Force.

I hate to pin a relative program down to any one period of zenith danger.

In fact, today's estimates give the Soviet Union a capability which she may well consider as adequate to warrant the risk of a major aggression now. Nevertheless, the Soviet-Satellite capability is on a rising curve. As far as we can learn, Russia's modernization of her own and satellite forces, and the continued training within those forces that has built up her magnificent trained reserve, will reach a high point of veteran experience and knowledge, and a good point of material and equipment supply, in the area of time centered around 1954. After that, if sufficient means are provided, our relative capability will get closer and closer to that of the Soviets, and eventually minimize the risk of war--at least will eventually minimize the temptation for the Soviet Union to go to war.

Due to the lead-time required in preparedness, the actions we take here today can bring results in time to meet that threat. In my opinion, the sooner we meet that threat with some specific military power and capability, the better off we will be.

Our warning against the expenditure limitation and the budget ceiling is a matter of record. Any further major cuts, and certainly any further delimitation of expenditures for Fiscal Year 1953 could be militarily disastrous.

In the realm of national security, there is one precious commodity on sale today, especially for the United States because we have the price to buy it: "time". Next year and in succeeding years the price will be higher and there will be less "time" we can purchase. If we are allowed any time for preparedness after the next two or three years, I think we will be lucky. If we make proper use of the time that is allowed us to strengthen our forces, we can build a deterrent that the Soviet Union may respect, and we may avoid having a war at all. As an American citizen I believe it is very foolish for us not to make the best use of the time we have.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1951 AT 11:00 A.M. (EST)

The Freedom's Foundation is presenting $100,000 in Freedom Awards to more than 800 American individuals and organizations for outstanding contributions to freedom during 1950 at ceremonies at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania.

NBC will carry the program, which will include General Bradley's remarks from 11:00 to 11:30 A.M. (EST) Thursday, February 22, 1950.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Here at Valley Forge, at the bleak, winter retreat of a defeated American Army, we have gathered to warm our hands and our hearts to a greater task -- a global struggle for freedom's eternal survival.

I am convinced that we will win this struggle. In this righteous crusade, we shall succeed. And all those nations, joined with us in spirit and in action, will remain alive and free.

That winter at Valley Forge was a battle without gunfire, a struggle without glory. Because of their suffering and their defeats, the American troops almost abandoned the cause. But their leader, General Washington, never lost faith.

Now there is little chance that the march toward freedom will ever falter. Too many generations have been sustained by the miracle of individual liberty; too many men have lived in freedom to abandon it without a fight.

The survival of freedom depends on the collective industrial and political power of the nations who have joined in this crusade. In this torn world, the backbone of freedom takes its strength from the power we have to defend it.

The United States, and the freedom-loving nations of the world, have a greater industrial potential than our combined enemies. In the long run, this industrial production and skill will assure our military supremacy if we need it.

MORE

Among the free nations, we are attaining an international political understanding. The North Atlantic Treaty, as a first step, is a stronger combination than the compulsory league of Soviet satellites. In our individual nations, we are stronger because each of us is free. In every satellite nation, where communism rules through the tyranny of a power-hungry minority, there exists a fundamental political weakness.

Morally, and fundamentally, the free world has the undeniable power of a better idea. In our way of life, no worship is denied, no abandonment of religion is required; no elections are counterfeited, no automatic "yes" is demanded.

The sum total of our strength in these broad areas will assure ultimate victory over communism. And for the moment, we are the trusted leaders of this crusade. But in order to win, we must provide the kind of leadership that free men can respect and support.

In this great responsibility, we Americans need humility.

Many of us are caught in the illusion that we -- of all the people in this world -- are self-sufficient. Because of the supreme confidence we have in our strength, in our faith, and in ourselves, it is difficult to admit the need of help.

However, the American people, for all their strength and abundant charity, need guidance, courage, and inspiration. In our American pride at being the arsenal of democracy, we must remember that we are also regarded as the arsenal of hope. Great leadership in such a righteous cause requires that a nation be humble -- before its God and its fellowmen.

As we seek to protect the freedom which we hold in trust, we must provide more than material things. We must provide more than guns for soldiers, more than food for starving people, more than thoughts for hungry minds. We must show them our faith to bolster theirs.

We should realize that our nation is distinguished in this world by the great quality of freedom which sets us apart. There are civilizations, religions, and ways of life much older than ours, which mark other countries and other people for special regard. Many of our precepts, and some of our modes of life have been drawn from this background.

But it is this devotion to freedom that marks the American way of life. So long as the American people sustain this devotion, and cherish and protect and continue to earn the liberty which we hold so dear, this nation will deserve a great place in the history of humanity.

Nature's resources, and our genius for development of them, were placed in this bright area of the world to be shared unselfishly in time of need. I believe that the American people will be endowed with the genius for development and invention only so long as their energies are devoted to the greater good. Realistically, we must acknowledge that the greater good for the world requires continued contribution of energy, faith, and cooperation from all peoples who hope to share the American abundance.

MORE

Frequently the cry is heard, "How can we go on giving and sharing indefinitely; won't we spread it all too thin and dissipate our strength?" We hope that friendly nations will some day become self-sufficient and independent of our aid. For the present, our assistance is needed to hasten their recovery. For the American people to falter or hesitate is unthinkable, for we are provided with ample strength upon which to draw.

We have friends -- staunch, courageous and worthy people who respect our leadership and join us in support of freedom.

We are provided with the strength of diversity which no regimented people can equal. When we apply the initiative and imagination of enterprising men to a difficult problem, we can count on a solution.

Divine Providence gives us another, and greater strength which has never surrendered to any threat or peril. This is the spiritual strength of our religious freedom -- every man looking to his God, with faith and with prayer, for the guidance and the courage that human minds alone never quite provide.

There is an old truism that if something too big, is given to someone too small, to carry, either the load must be lightened or the carrier must grow big enough, strong enough, for the burden. There is little chance, as I read the avowed intentions of communism, that the load will be lightened soon, or that we may be able to shift it entirely to other shoulders. Since we now bear the burden, there is only one solution -- we and our friends must become strong enough to carry it lightly, and with great endurance, and for a long time.

Our own confidence is essential to our leadership. We must maintain the basic quality of a right estimate of ourselves and our abilities. I believe it is this kind of humility which is required of a leader-nation in these times of peril. I would not have us think less of ourselves than we should.

I believe that we can take some inspiration in our present trouble from the words of a famous American, Thomas Paine, who wrote of our earlier crisis just before Washington's troops wintered here at Valley Forge:

> "I have as little superstition in me as any man living, but my secret opinion has ever been, and still is, that God Almighty will not give up a people to military destruction, or leave them unsupportedly to perish, who have so earnestly and so repeatedly sought to avoid the calamities of war, by every decent method which wisdom could invent. Neither have I so much of the infidel in me, as to suppose that He has relinquished the government of the world, and given us up to the care of devils;. . ."

In this assemblage today at Valley Forge, we have tried to capture some of the spirit and humility so necessary to the task of preserving freedom. These awards presented by the Freedoms Foundation mark significant contributions to this great cause for which free men crusade.

Dear General Brad:

About the weekend of the eleventh of November: Please don't say no until you have to. It's a wholly informal, flexible weekend and even a last-minute decision would be most agreeable.

Dear Ed:

I am having to leave this afternoon for the trip with the President to the Pacific and have not had time to check thoroughly my schedule for November as it relates to joining you for the second week end of the month. I can't think of any nicer way to spend a week end than the one you suggest with Averell, Bill Paley, Mr. Field, and you. However, I have such a full schedule because of the meetings coming up in connection with NATO and catching up thereafter that I am not sure yet whether I can make it. I think I can, but if you must have an answer now, it would have to be "no."

I will write you again when I return from the trip.

With best personal regards.

Sincerely,

Brad

Dear General Bradley:

I hope you will remember that I mentioned some pheasant and duck shooting the second weekend in November.

Our place is on Quaker Hill, near Pawling, about an hour and forty-five minutes drive north of New York. I will be glad to drive you and Mrs. Bradley up either Friday night or Saturday morning or, if you care to fly up on Saturday morning, I could pick you up at Stewart Field which is only about twenty-five miles from our place. The plan now is that the party would consist of Averell Harriman, Bill Paley, Marshall Field and yourself. The shooting will be fairly rough and the living conditions somewhat rustic, but I can promise plenty of pheasant and some reasonably fast flying duck.

We both hope that you and Mrs. Bradley can join us.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Reporting to the American people on The Hague meeting, General Bradley will say in part:

> . . . . . "as these defensive plans develop, traditions will have to give way to reality. And even our own balance of United States forces—if we expand beyond the present levels—may have to give way to the theory of national specialization, which will fit into an overall balance for collective defense."

At a luncheon meeting of the Executives' Club of Chicago, Friday, April 14th, at 12:30 noon.

ADDRESS BY
GENERAL OMAR N. BRADLEY
CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF
BEFORE THE EXECUTIVES' CLUB OF CHICAGO
MORRISON HOTEL, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
AT 12:30 P.M. (CST), 1:30 P.M. (EST), FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1950

Whether we recognize it or not, the American people have decided to hold and save Western Europe for the free world.

In this decision, we are counting on the wholehearted cooperation of the other North Atlantic Treaty Nations. We especially require the utmost efforts of the peoples who live in Europe, and who must make the major contribution toward saving themselves.

Although we may not have realized it at the time, we Americans have been making this decision for the past nine years. In the Atlantic Charter in 1941, we announced to the world that Americans wanted peace, and wanted the world to be free from aggression. When the United States, and this principle, were attacked, we went to war to defend it, and ourselves.

While the battles raged in Europe and across the world in the Pacific, the basic premise -- cooperation for peace -- was stated again in the United Nations Charter in 1943.

At the end of the war in 1945, we assumed that the peace had been won, and that no participant in that war would again endanger the tranquility, or deter the economic rehabilitation of Europe.

With the agreements at Yalta, and the plans for the future made at Potsdam in 1945, Americans felt that they had assured the future cooperation of all nations who had been on the side of victory in World War II.

Almost immediately we disarmed. And to speed the economic reconstruction of war-torn countries, we fostered the Marshall Plan, inviting all nations of Europe to participate. Significantly , some nations in Eastern Europe declined the invitation.

MORE

Then in February of 1948, we were jolted from complacency to cold war by the seizure in Czechoslovakia. Americans were stunned. But we were not convinced that this meant any permanent disruption of our orderly program for reconstruction and peace. However, our friends in Western Europe were not so unwary. A few days after the Iron Curtain clanked down on Czechoslovakia, the Brussels Pact was signed for 50 years of collective security.

In April and May of 1948, the Italian elections began the cold war operations of that spring. Communism failed in that struggle, and Italy was aligned on the side of peace. But the line was drawn. From Stettin to Trieste, the boundary between freedom and aggression was established.

The American people were confused by all of these events. But our decision in favor of Europe and freedom was not revoked. In the United Nations, we continued to uphold the spirit of the Charter. In the Berlin airlift, we gave Europe a symbol of American determination.

Under the shadow of the wings of the airlift, the free nations of the West were drawn together, and in April 1949, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was born.

One year ago this month, we joined with eleven other nations in a pact for the collective defense of the North Atlantic area. For the uneasy peace needed a policeman. The political aggression which skulked under the cloak of a cold war had to be discouraged. It is our hope -- and the hope of the friendly nations in the North Atlantic community -- that this Pact provides the opposition to aggression -- both political and military -- which might disturb the peaceful progress we all desire.

For the American people, there is a great difference in the situation today and the situation nine years ago. At that time, our national attitude had not been crystallized. In 1950, however, this long succession of acts has given proof that the United States has forever forsaken isolation for international cooperation.

By charter, by treaty, by action -- with dollar after dollar -- the Western world has been helping to build a community of nations to establish peace in the boiling caldron of Europe. Germany and Austria -- former enemies of the allied nations -- remain in the category of unsettled problems. If our means have been less than perfect, and our policy less than steady, Americans can be excused by the lack of suspicion that was ours.

Today, the Atlantic pattern for freedom is unmistakable and almost complete.

MORE

Against this background of decision by the American people, your Secretary of Defense and I participated in the Defense Ministers Committee Meeting and in the Military Committee Meeting two weeks ago in The Hague. The Military Committee recommended to the Defense Ministers, and the Defense Ministers recommended to the North Atlantic Treaty Council, certain plans and organizational programs for the security of the Atlantic community.

Our discussions were rooted in the belief that the North Atlantic Treaty coalition could create a combined strength for collective security and, through self-help and mutual aid, build a greater deterrent to aggression than we have had so far.

Just a year ago, this Pact was signed in Washington. Four months later, it was ratified by the governments of all the signatory nations. Two months later, the first meetings of the Defense Ministers Committee and the Military Committee were held in Washington. At the second meetings in December, the Military Committee and the Defense Ministers Committee suggested to their governments a concept of military strategic guidance, which was accepted. It is the concept upon which our defensive plans are founded.

In four short months since that concept was first approved, the Regional Planning Groups and the Standing Group have drawn up the first general estimates of the forces which might be needed to deter aggression, and to hold the common frontiers in the heart of Europe. The plan includes provision to keep open the vital supply lines -- within the regions, and from nation to nation -- that must link these countries if all are to be protected. Each military chief who participated in this planning at The Hague realizes that this is merely a preliminary estimate -- a gross plan which needs much refinement.

Like any military plan, it must be subject to constant revision. Personally, I cautioned that the total forces prescribed -- air, land and sea forces -- were of such dimensions that the twelve governments of the North Atlantic Treaty might consider them beyond our reach. However, at every step the Military Committee pointed out that this first plan, drawn in bold strokes, only establishes a blueprint which can be modified as duplications are ironed out, and refinements are made.

Further, our exchange of information among the twelve nations -- and for that matter, among the five Regional Planning Groups -- could not be nearly complete in four short months. With an improvement in our security arrangements, and an improvement in the exchange of intelligence information, we may be able to scale down the requirements, and speed up the early implementation of the defensive plan.

MORE

It would be a mistake to lead the American people, or any of the member nations of this Pact, into thinking that we now have a complete master plan for the integrated defense of the North Atlantic area. But we do have a beginning from which we can work. The spirit of cooperation, and the profound dedication of these other nations to the self-help principle is most encouraging. They realize that they must not wait for the United States to carry the load and pay the bill. They realize the tremendous need for each nation to subscribe wholeheartedly -- financially, economically, and politically -- to the collective defense.

One of the small nations of this Treaty made the most significant suggestion. The spokesman said that in approaching the buildup of its armed forces, this small nation found that, even with the help which could be expected from the United States, its financial resources would be sorely taxed to make an adequate contribution to these defensive plans.

His statement was not preliminary to a further request for aid. Rather, it was made in the hope that all nations would realize the present shortcomings, and that those who were not wholeheartedly contributing to the implementation of the defensive plans would reexamine their efforts. It was even suggested that somewhere within the North Atlantic community of nations, a central body be set up to indicate to each of the partners the means, the rate and extent by which his armed forces must be expanded.

Just as the spokesman for that small nation indicated, as these defensive plans develop, traditions will have to give way to reality. And even our own balance of United States forces -- if we expand beyond the present levels -- may have to give way to the theory of national specialization, which will fit into an overall balance for collective defense.

For example, the North Atlantic Treaty defensive plans might require from us a greater air force, or a greater navy, than we ourselves would normally be willing to provide.

With such an arrangement, of course, a small bit of sovereignty is relinquished. But when I think that national pride and sovereignty are often paid for with the life and blood of soldiers, I feel that we must accept the more difficult alternative which comes with this joining of hands in collective defense.

The defensive plans made at The Hague, and submitted to our Government, need not change the balance of forces, nor decrease the appropriations requested from the Congress for the Armed Forces this year. The forces of the North Atlantic Treaty organization are so modest and so needful that every soldier, every ship, every plane, and every weapon counts, and will not be wasted. But in the future years, we must consider most carefully what our friends can best contribute before we decide what the American dollar should buy for the collective defense.

MORE

I feel that 1950 is the year of the turning point. A change in American thinking that began in 1941 has been confirmed by a series of actions -- the Atlantic Charter, the United Nations Charter, the Marshall Plan, the North Atlantic Treaty, and the Military Aid Program -- to the point that this nation, in its role of world leadership, can willingly make the first contribution of national sovereignty to the collective security of the Western world. If necessary, in future years we can identify our Armed Forces so closely with those of our allies, that we can achieve a collective force for mutual security. This is in keeping with the principle that each nation must provide that for which his resources, and his geographical location are best suited.

Step by step, and frequently working from crisis to crisis, we have developed a pattern of security for the Western world. It was like building a fence across Europe in the face of the Iron Curtain. With the Marshall Plan, we dug the post holes; with the North Atlantic Treaty, we have set the posts. If that fence is to be effective, it needs a strong mesh of wire that can only be provided by well-equipped, integrated military forces.

The military aid from this country to the armies, navies, and the air forces of our friends will help provide the strong mesh of wire for the allied fence. The first shipments have begun to flow; the organizations and the technical help are in place, ready to receive the equipment. Actually, however, it is too early for proof that this aid has already made positive contribution to the strength of our mutual defenses. It will take time and training, and further adaptation, before we can bring you a complete report.

Nevertheless, if there is going to be wire on this expensive fence that we have built with our friends around the land-holding of this community of nations, we will have to continue to aid these forces. We will have to maintain our present strength and improve it while each other nation steadily improves along with us.

Because the world is divided at the moment, we face the possibility of international aggression. It is the gnawing threat with which we must live. But it is my hope -- it is the American determination -- that the tendency for aggrandizement, and the use of force will gradually diminish. This North Atlantic Pact and the security plans which it has evolved -- is the world's greatest example of economic-political-military integration for peace.

History has shown us that a treaty can become a mere scrap of paper. So far, in its first year, this Treaty has been transformed into a living thing, an influence for peace, a deterrent to aggression.

We would be less than realistic if we did not realize that for the past two years, the atomic bomb, the American Air Force, and the tremendous industrial potential of this nation and its allies have performed miracles in discouraging aggression. But with our continued help and support, it is my firm belief that the North Atlantic Treaty and its organization for security and for defense can rapidly become a greater force for peace than any single nation can provide -- a greater deterrent to war than any bomb that ever existed.

Dear Ed:

I latched a ride from my boss man Saturday and scampered on home without amends for an early departure and without sufficient thanks for a delightful evening. I thoroly enjoyed it--especially those ad libs from the President on his VP.

En route home, I bearded the boss on the ritual about which you spoke at dinner. Because he is almost the only bird with any honest balance on this business of defense, he must sell his stuff more convincingly than he has done. He, of course, realizes this but he has also been a victim of that hot seat in which he sits. It leaves little time for thinking and a great deal less for moving around. We did make a start today, however, when the General accepted an invitation to meet with Association of Radio News Analysts on February 24th. Thereafter, we'll get together on the occasional briefing about which you spoke.

When you come to town, he does wish to see you. The name Murrow is as magical in the Pentagon building as it was in London during the war.

Excerpt from letter from General Bradley to Lt. Gen. Geoffrey Keyes, CG, U.S. Forces in Austria, dated 23 September 1948.

You already know that Edward R. Murrow, CBS commentator appealed to me several weeks ago for guidance in his treatment of a story which trickled out from Vienna. As Bryant Moore has already informed you, the secrecy necessitated in the trial of Lt. Colonel Walter Rishel has roused a suspicion that the Army is deliberately concealing an unsavory scandal. It was also suggested that the secrecy stemmed from a desire of the Army to whitewash ranking officers that may have been involved.

Mr. Murrow certainly is not desirous of prosecuting the Army unfairly. However, as a newsman, he cannot voluntarily withhold information which he believes should be aired as a matter of public interest. And he has conscientiously considered the fact that any malodorous revelation would provide opportunities for propaganda and exploitation.

After discussing the case with the Secretary of the Army and with my staff here, I am convinced that the only sound policy to which the Army can adhere is to air as completely and freely as possible the facts as they are uncovered. Where information is suppressed without valid reason, the Army unwittingly subjects itself to the suspicious reasoning that we are trying to hide our faults and our thieves. Ordinarily the speculation engendered by this suspicion is considerably worse than the facts of the case might warrant.

Certainly you are best qualified to judge how the trial should be handled but I was anxious to have you understand our views and the circumstances by which we became involved in the Murrow broadcast.

WASHINGTON, D.C. 20008

This letter is from Martha Biehle (now Dean of Stevens College in Missouri) who was at that time Acting Executive Secretary of the National Student Federation of America, while E. R. Murrow was President.

I believe that "we" refers to her and Ed - the earliest reference I have to his radio work.

Jean B. Patterson

an extremely interesting time in Mexico. Where are you, and what are you photographing this time?

Sorry, This afternoon we have had our fourth radio program. In fact, it was one of our best — but unfortunately the end of the first baseball game of the season was a tie and they played on for seventeen minutes of our precious forty-five. So we furiously rushed to

April 14th, 1930

Dear Marvin,

It was good of you to write us from the boat going to Mexico. I was sorry, too, that you could not stay in New York long enough to come to see us at the office for a while before you had to leave for our southern neighbor.

I hope you're having cut our program to fit into twenty-eight minutes. We had to cut out most of our music which was too bad - for our singer was Miss Fjeril Hess, a Californian, who sings Russian folk songs in Russian and in English and plays her own accompaniment on the tupo (?) a native Russian instrument.

We've just recently heard from Chester Williams that Mr. Harry Chandler in Los Angeles has had to postpone his luncheon for the NSFA until May! Naturally we're all swearing lustily! Now we're faced with a real predicament — raising real money here in NYC so that we can go on with our plans for next fall. Without money we can do practically nothing.

Within a day or two I'm going to reduce the list of advisors & send a short list out to the Exec. Committee again.

We enjoyed "A Month in the Country" very much and are looking forward with real interest to "Hotel Universe" this week.

Affectionately, Martha

THE PURPOSE OF THE CONGRESS:

This is the one and the official national gathering of student leaders held in the United States during the year. The aim of the Congress is to provide an opportunity for the most prominent students in the country to discuss together their common problems, to decide on concerted action in regard to the responsibilities of the N. S. F. A. to the world federation of students, and to further student contact by meeting on a social as well as a business basis.

The aims of the Congress embody the fundamental purpose of the N. S. F. A. itself as worded in the preamble to the Constitution: "We would achieve a spirit of cooperation among the students of the United States of America to give consideration to questions affecting students' interests; we would develop an intelligent student opinion on questions of national an international importance; we would foster understanding among the students of the world in the furtherance of an enduring peace."

DETAIL CONGRESS PLANS

The Committee for the Fourth Annual Congress has arranged a program of discussions and entertainment for students to stimulate consideration of the actual problems of their colleges and to foster the frienships so essential between various sections of the country. The work of managing an effective Congress has been divided between Mr. Ursel Narver, Chairman for the West, and Miss Martha Wentworth, Chairman for the East. The constant attention, the concerete suggestions and the far-seeing imagination of Mr. E. H. Miller, President of the Federation, and Mr. Lewis Fox, Ex-President, have been invaluable to the formulation of Congress plans. A series of letters has been sent to the Presidents of Universities and student councils of both member and non-member colleges, and the enthusiasm and interest already received substantiate the promise that this year's plans merit for a particularly vital Congress. The program may be divided into the following phases:

1. Business sessions include the detail transactions of old business from last year, the election of officers, financial reports, and organization plans for the following year.

2. Discussion groups form the real life and achievement of the Congress. Their chief purpose is to consider practical problems confronting American college students. The Committee wishes to keep these groups flexible and if several students desire a separate discussion of a particular problem other leaders of wide experience will be available. Mr. J. T. Jackson, formerly of Howard College, Birmingham, Alabama, who has made an exhaustive and admirable study of the honor systems of practically every college in the country, will lead a discussion on that subject. Mr. Narver, who has had much experience with student organization on the Pacific Coast, will take the chair for student government in large colleges, and Miss Elizabeth Scarlett, President of the Student Body at Vasssar, will conduct the discussion for women's colleges. Fraternities will probably be introduced by Mr. Willhite, President of the Student Council at Washington University, and Mr. M. Adolphus Cheek, Captain of the Harvard football team in '26 is the provision leader for the group on athletics. Two members of the Committee who were largely responsible for local arrangements for the Nebraska Congress, Mr. Monroe Kezer and Miss Ruth Palmer, will probably conduct the table on journalism. The office of chairman on militarism in education will be shared by a student selected by Mr. Tucker Smith of the Committee on Militarism in Education and a man from the Missouri R. O. T. C. Both Mr. Gerhart Jentsh and Mr. John Rothschild of the Open Road will contribute to the discussion of international relations.

3. The standing committees will present reports of the studies made during the year on Organization, Curriculum, Finance, Travel and Foreign Relations, Student Government, Publicity and Debating.

4. Three main speakers of national repute and particular interest to students will discuss three general phases of the theme of the Congress, namely, the destinations and possibilities of literature, politics and education and their relation to college life.

5. Social arrangements for the Congress have been made on the same splendid standard of hospitality that characterized earlier Congresses. The local plans indicate the high interest of the University of Missouri in this Congress. Missouri students will be on hand to meet delegates at the station and introduce them to the sorority and fraternity houses where they will stay and probably have their meals. Registration will take place on Wednesday afternoon and a moderate fee of ten dollars will be asked from each delegate and observer to cover all the costs of the Congress. If the attendance is two hundred and fifty the return railroad fare will be reduced one half on round trip tickets. A court stenographer will make records of all the important meetings, and a printing press will be available for the use of delegates. Bulletin boards and literature tables will also present material about student activities and organizations interested in various phases of the work of the N. S. F. A. Detailed programs will be presented upon registration, and the public is cordially invited to attend all meetings and especially the plenary sessions.

HISTORY OF THE N. S. F. A.

The National Student Federation of the United States grew out of the Inter-collegiate World Court Congress which met at Princeton University in December, 1925. Two houndred and forty five colleges and Universities represented there adopted a temporary constitution providing for a year of experiment in organizing the students in this country and in planning lines of work. During the ensuing year it framed a permanent constitution, developed the internal organization of the N. S. F. A., established relations with the International Confederation of Students, and promoted European student travel for American students. At the Congress at the University of Michigan the constitution was adopted and various additional amendments were authorized at the Nebraska Congress in 1927.

The first years of the Federation's activities have been directed by two purposes: the stimulation and formulation of the ideals of American student thought, and second, the organization of a student federation that should be equipped in its executive and financial policies to work out those ideals. Any consideration of the work of the committees and offices of the N. S. F. A., especially during the last year, shows that it is now on a sound basis. The machinery for connecting the students of all parts of the United States and linking their organization with the student unions of the whole world, is running smoothly.

This is the year for the Congress to give serious consideration to its future aims, to be looking for concrete achievements by which to fulfill its obligations and opportunities to American college life. The theme of the Congress has been chosen to stimulate this determination of the future scope of the student's share in his own education. This integration of student interest and self-direction with experienced and progressive faculty and administrative groups can only be achieved through the study of certain definite problems. The success of the Congress depends upon the active participation of all the delegates, and the Congress Committee can only meet the student interests of which it is aware. Delegates are urged to come prepared with questions on the definite problems of their colleges so that the combined experience of students from all the colleges may help solve these problems. What is the main problem of student life on your campus? Is it athletics, co-ordination between student and faculty bodies on disciplinary matters, rushing, raising campaign funds, regulations for building fraternity houses, the honor system, freshman week, or what? The Congress will succeed only as it meets the definite problems of the colleges represented. Upon each delegate's desire to solve the problem of his school and his willingness to pool with other students his knowledge of college life depend the success and justification of the N. S. F. A. and in a large measure the future share of the American student in his own education.

RECENT ACTIVITIES OF THE N. S. F. A.

1. In the fall an Executive Office was estblished at Phillips Brooks House, Cambridge, Mass., as the President attends Harvard Law School. A full time secretary has been employed and this office handles all general correspondence, plans for new memberships and cooperation with the Congress Chairman of the East on plans for the Congress.

2. The Foreign Relations and Travel Office has been established at 218 Madison Avenue. It is a self-supporting office, housed in two rooms, an office and a club room for the reception of foreign students and cooperation with organizations interested in them. Miss Martha H. Biehle, of Wellesley College, Vice President of the N. S. F. A., and Miss Marjorie Marston, of Vassar, act as executive secretaries. This office, through the kindness of Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, arranged a dinner and reception on November 20th, for prominent citizens, to make known the work of the Federation and consider possible lines for future development.

3. The Publicity Committee published the N. S. F. A. Yearbook, which has been sent to all student government bodies, the President of every accredited University, foreign student organizations and important public and all member-college libraries.

4. The student government questionnaire distributed at the Nebraska Congress to all delegates has been compiled and edited by Ursel Narver, and a report will be presented at the Missouri Congress.

5. Over one thousand International Student Identity Cards have been issued during the past year. These cards enable students to obtain reductions on visas, railroad, airway and museum expenses, and along with letters of introduction for private hospitality, introduce American students to students abroad.

6. The N. S. F. A.-C. I. E. Official Delegation to Europe this summer included fifty two students representing Harvard, Washington and Lee, Haverford, Vassar, Smith, Wellesley, Bryn Mawr, Connecticut, Mills and Barnard. Twenty-six of these delegates officially represented the N. S. F. A. and participated in the Xth C. I. E. Council Meeting at Paris.

7. Elaborate plans for the reception in this country of a delegation of European students were made in the summer, but owing to delayed publicity in Europe this delegation did not materialize. Plans are now well under way for the reception of a group of fifty South African students who will arrive in this country on January 5th for a month's visit of American cities, including New York, Washington, Chicago, Boston, Buffalo, Detroit, and also Canada. A German group is interested in coming in April and a C. I. E. delegation plans to arrive next summer. In addition to these groups the Foreign Relations Office welcomes and assists numerous individual students from abroad who are visiting or studying in this country.

8. Did you know that all international debating was now managed by the N. S. F. A.? The Institute of International Education has turned over this responsibility to the Federation as being a logical part of the work of a student organization. Negotiations were concluded in England for the English Debating teams which come to this country and the organization of the tours has since been handled at the Foreign Relations Office. The British Universities Women's Team and the Oxford Team are now in this country. The Australian team is touring the Middle West, and a team from Canada will visit colleges in the North Central district in January. The Oxford team will broadcast over W. J. Z. and the blue network on December 15th, at 6:50 P. M.

ENDORSEMENTS

"I am glad to avail myself of the opportunity to endorse the foundation of the National Student Federation. It is gratifying indeed to find the youth of our land manifesting a deep interest in the development of an intelligent influence on questions of national importance and the fostering of an enduring world peace. If these worthy purposes are kept constantly in view, the Federation cannot fail to wield a very helpful influence on public opinion. I wish the Federation every success, with an ever-widening sphere of usefulness."

—JOHN W. DAVIS.

"I consider it vital to have the young men and women of our universities and colleges interest themselves in questions of national and international importance. I should prefer to see such an organization take form in such a way that it will not seem to be primarily interested in world peace or in any other single movement, no matter how great its significance may be. I feel that such an organization under proper leadership can stimulate student thought along national lines in a way that is not possible otherwise. There are of course many difficulties in the way of adequately handling such an organization but I feel that it is so worth while that those who are interested should make every effort to definitely formulate their plans, and make the attempt."

—RAY LYMAN WILBUR,
President, Leland Stanford University.

"I think it can only be fortunate that by forming the National Student Federation of America, the students of this country have endeavored to place themselves in some organized relation with students of other countries. Students everywhere have a common interest, and I can see nothing but good to come from spreading among American students an interest in the problems of students abroad."

—MANLEY O. HUDSON,
Bemis Professor of International Law
Harvard Law School.

The wisdom shown by the representatives of the students belonging to the National Student Federation in the programs they have discussed at their congresses and the excellent form of organization they have adopted go far to create confidence in their capacity to be of undoubted service in assisting in improving the administration of our higher institutions of learning."

Director of the Institute of International Education.

Dear Marvin,

As I may have told you some time ago, Ed Murrow, the President of the N.S.F.A. arrives soon for a visit of several weeks in New York City. He will be here for the Executive Committee Meeting the end of this month (June 25th to 29th), and he seems also to have picked up his belongings and come on to New York City for an indefinite length of time. He is planning to meet his own expenses in New York and will hunt for some kind of a job while here.

He is a boy who has worked his way through school and cannot afford any extra expenses. I am therefore, very eager to find some place for him to stay for a few weeks while he is trying to locate something to do to maintain himself here. If we can find some family who will be willing to give Ed room and breakfast for about two weeks, it will mean a great deal to him and will make the little money that he has go so much further.

Can you suggest any family who have a home in N.Y.C. and have the means to be able to entertain Ed in this informal way without it inconveniencing them any? Ed is a very charming boy who would be very pleasant company I think, and would quite agreeably fit in with any plans of his host and hostess.

Since we are expecting Ed to arrive the first part of this coming week,- perhaps by Wednesday, the 18th - we are very eager to locate such a home, if possible, within the next few days. If you know of anyone who would be willing to do this for us, we should appreciate it very much. Unfortunately my own apartment is much too small to permit any guests. I'll be grateful to you if you will phone me on Monday or Tuesday and tell me if you have any suggestions of families he might visit.

You'll be interested to know that the summer tour from the C.I.E. is definitely coming. We received a cable this morning from London informing us of ten definite registrations and a possible three more!!

Affectionately yours,

Martha

Miss Marvin Breckinridge
455 East 57th Street
New York, New York

Dear Marvin:

I have tried to get in touch with you by telephone several times in the last week. I understood you were to be in the city during the week and had expected to be able to reach you by phone.

You will probably recall my telling you that the Executive Committee of the N.S.F.A. would arrive in New York this week. Ed Murrow, our president, has already come and has been here for about three days. We are now working over the agenda and the program for the meeting this week. The Executive Committee will be here from June 25th to 29th.

I should like very much to provide a small amount of informal entertainment for the members of the Committee. I should also like an opportunity to have some of the group here in New York meet the Executive Committee. I wonder if it would be asking too much to suggest that if it is convenient for you, we should like to have you allow us to meet in your apartment on this Thursday evening. If you can do so, we should also be most appreciative to have you entertain for a very informal supper the members of the Executive Committee. There will be nine of them, including Marjorie and myself, and there is a possibility that there may be ten. The ideal arrangement, I should think, would be to have the Executive Committee meet at your apartment for a very informal buffet supper at about six-thirty and then to ask some of our New York Committee to come in at about eight o'clock for a discussion with the Executive Committee during the evening. We should like to use this meeting to discuss informally the business which confronts the N.S.F.A. and particularly those major problems which have concerned the New York Committee this spring. There will probably not be more than six extra members in this New York Committee present in the evening.

Miss M. B., 2

I hesitate to write to ask you to do this because I know that you have already given so generously to the Federation. This type of informal entertainment in your apartment would, however, add so much to the pleasure of the Executive Committee while it is here that I want you to consider whether you can do it. Please do not hesitate to tell me if it would be either inconvenient or impossible. I should like, however, to have word from you immediately so that I can try to make some other plans if you cannot do this. This is for Thursday evening, June the 26th.

With very kind regards,

Cordially yours,

Martha Biehle

TRIP TO EUROPE

As I lay in my peagreen inside cabin on New Amsterdam in July 1939 and wept - wrote breaking-off letters to three beaux - cut irksome ties - sad - off to make my place in a new world -

Never dreamt (in lonely exhaustion) that instead of six weeks trip to Europe, photojournalism for Life, Town and Country, etc. and joining parents to visit cousins in England for last fortnight, then home -

I would be abroad two years before returning to U.S., be on both sides of war three times (a record), have a new career broadcasting for C.B.S., and finally marry an American diplomat with whom I visited P.O.W. camps all over Germany, piling up a total of fifty air-raids in several countries, courtesy of R.A.F., Luftwaffe and French Air Force.

Well, so fancy-free, equipped with a dressing-case, two suitcases (one full of riding and evening clothes), hatbox, typewriter and Rolleiflex camera, I landed in France July 15, the day on which the German-Russian Pact was announced.

Paris? See diary - told not to go on - but

SWITZERLAND

Stayed at Schweizerhof in Lucerne, well-situated and well-run, made contacts with tourist office, studied program for festival, planned photographs, wrote notes for articles (find and list some subjects) while political situation became gloomier and gloomier.

Friends from boat - Louise Mdvani and John Archbold, also attending festival and couldn't read German , so I translated notices posted in middle of shop windows every few hours - people couldn't wait for newspapers - often queues to read them - worse and worse - first choir of Sistine Chapel couldn't attend festival, then others, festival breaking down, tourists didn't dare travel.

Was in quandary - had planned to attend Nazi Parteitag in Nuremburg - secured for me by a Washington acquaintance, J.P., who was then First Secretary of American Embassy in Berlin. Finally it was cancelled, so my job there was off.

When the day came that my elderly waiter brought my delicious breakfast into the room, with tears streaming down his face and into his white mustache, saying chokingly "They've gone into Poland" - there was no need to ask to whom he referred - I decided to move westward. No music festival and no Parteitag to photograph, no point in traveling for pleasure in a continent at war, no point in risking getting stuck on the wrong side of such a war (for it was obvious to me then that Germany was the wrong side) and it wasn't MY war, so I'd better go home -

SWITZERLAND TO FRANCE

With an agreeable English girl, Olive, who was traveling alone and staying in the same hotel, we took the night train for Paris, three (or four) days after I had arrived. Officials were so demoralized that they omitted the usual passport and customs formalities - indeed, we didn't lay eyes on any French officials - this at a time when suspicious characters would actually try to cross borders. But we were not suspicious - only two of thousands of tourists trying to get home before the storm broke.

The trains were overcrowded of course - but by dint of one of us watching the luggage on the Paris station platform while the other got a cup of coffee and a roll, we were the only people we heard of who arrived in England with all their luggage - after sitting on it for hours on the densely packed platform, we got into a train for (the coast) and our fellow passengers near us were all French workmen called back into the Army - There they were, dressed in the overalls of workmen or corduroys of farmers (they told us they wore their worst clothes which they would mail home as soon as they got their uniforms, while keeping their best at home for after the war) and looking melancholy and dispirited. There was no spirit of crusade or even excitement about them - their country called them, and they went unwillingly, the more so because they did not see the point of France fighting just because Germany had invaded Poland. What do we care? We want to stay home and be left alone. They looked at us, smartly dressed and obviously foreigners, with slight antipathy. Perhaps they were thinking we were English (one of us was) who were putting them into the war they did not want. However, I started conversation in French, told them I was American, and asked for their opinions about the war. That is always a good way to interest a Frenchman - ask him for his opinion - he always has one and is delighted to explain it.

FRANCE TO ENGLAND

These men, who of course had all done their military service, were experienced enough to bring hearty lunches from home, chiefly bread, great hunks of cheese, and red wine which they gallantly share with two hungry girls, and the hours passed as the train stopped, delayed, picked up more recruits, started and stopped again - They got off finally to join their units, and we remained in a thoughtful mood while the train took us to the channel steamer, crowded with pleasant, serious-faced tourists, but not overcrowded as so many didn't have the travel-ex perience and gumption to get on to a French train to the port -

The boat-train pulled into blacked-out London in the late evening. By good fortune, it turned out that Olive's father was a director of the Savoy Hotel, so we drove there and were immediately given two large, handsome rooms, recently redecorated in extremely good taste and already with blackout curtains, each with a marble bathroom complete with a telephone extension from the room telephone - no more running dripping to answer! Leaving our luggage, ~~we felt our way around the corner~~, we went out the Savoy door, draped in enormous blackout curtains to exclude the light, felt our way around the corner in the pitch black darkness to Simpson's for the traditional roast beef, and back to our fine linen sheets and much-needed rest.

Again a waiter brought the news - It was Sunday, September 3rd, and when our breakfast came, he announced that Churchill would broadcast at eleven o'clock which was the deadline for the Germany reply to the British Note warning that if they did not desist in Poland, Britain would consider a state of war to exist. As we did not have a radio, the waiter came back with the news: the war was on! Our luxurious setting contrasted with the grim news of war, and with later settings in my experience: Meals in the basement gas shelter of an almost deserted house on the edge of London, a night sitting up in a compulsory and awkward life-jacket in the icy saloon of a steamer crossing the Irish Channel, a frigid night broadcasting from a concrete cellar in the basement of the incompleted radio station in Luxemburg, my legs wrapped in a blanket and my teeth chattering so that I feared the sound would carry all the way across America, and another cold, cheerless evening in a hotel in Kessel where, after inspecting the romantic-looking castle of Spangenberg and interviewing the British officers who were P.O.W's there, I spent six or eight hours (or was it all night?) in a large unheated,dimly-lit diningroom with the only American clergyman (an Episcopal Minister) left in Germany, who was later kicked out of the country. In fact, almost all unpleasant memories of physical surroundings are cold, but this third of September was warm and sunny, a pleasant day in contrast to the unpleasant (this is British under-statement) days of war that lay ahead.

First air-raid twenty minutes after war - in bath - porter knocked - couldn't keep that up - modestly dressed - Abraham Lincoln (?) - one plane did it.

The newspapers announced that a special service would be held at St. Paul's at three o'clock and the Royal Family would attend, so I went to say a prayer and to see how the English would take the distressing news. The enormous handsome building was full, people were calm but serious, no elation and no fear. The streets were deserted most people stayed at home with their families, not knowing how soon they would be separated by war.

Five months later in Berlin, I compared notes on the first day of war in Berlin. The government staged a parade and hoped for some enthusiasm, but it was a warm, clear day there too, and most people went on picnics and fishing trips to the lakes, just like any peacetime Sunday.

ENGLAND

Gas Mask
Haymarket
Fleet Street - Black Star
Weekend at Easton
Move to Branham Gardens, gas in slot room (did Savoy story, blackout in rain) Chesham House, radio, view over city of air-raids, inspected shelter personally
Stories for Life (list them)
Towcester at war- describe slowness.
Seven airfields near Northampton - never mentioned to anyone till after war - discretion essential - Germans would no doubt have liked to know

Dinner Ed and Janet Murrow's - old friend since N.S.F.A. W.F.A. days, crossed together April 1937 for Coronation, when he came to take up duties in London as Chief for C.B.S. - didn't think of broadcasting - didn't ask for job - easy way to get one!
Describe then - start of broadcasting etc., B.B.C. place - censor -

War in slump - had been invited to Ireland to ride - suggested story on Irish neutrality as it baffled me and I wanted to know more about it, as I thought American people would too. Ed told me his program had 22 million listeners. Even now I meet strangers who remember not only my name and work, sometimes by my voice, as my name has changed, but also parts of some of my broadcasts - very flattering!
Ed said VPs listened to Irish broadcast if this good, would I like regular staff job on Continent for C.B.S. after Christmas?
My preparations - languages, tragel experience, studied modern history at Vassar, written magazine articles, social experience and contacts with Europeans, interest in all kinds of people etc. Had once travelled alone - first with family then with then with another girl Glad I had.

IRELAND

Trip over uneventful - air or boat? Best Dublin hotel - old-fashioned but adequate - I thought food poor, but later Irish food was regarded by people in England as marvellous, because of meat and butter.

Had been there once before of Lambay, with Pendleton vagueness about train - drive to Cork.

Now Helen O'Mally - saw all kinds of opinion - the very Eir-ish, interview with Sir John Maffey, buns in a pub, tried to see Thompson, the German Consul (knew his mother later in Berlin - no letters for a year!) etc. --

Censorship - would not let me say that there were ~~these~~ more men from Eire in British Army than in their own.

Interesting to see what is censored - in England - only yellow light for grade two warning - anything else?

Studio over P.O. - green baize(?) clock ten minutes wrong I was allowed ten second error, five thirty if necessary - never more.

Message through censors - would I come to England next day and go to Sweden following day? I knew it was one chance for a job or not - said yes - begged off one day to visit Earl and Countess of Headfort at Kells - describe atmosphere and visit - British outlook.

Night on boat - station to C.B.S. office direct - looked as if I had slept in my clothes and I had (when I slept at all) - feet still ice to the knees - C.B.S. said: Oh, you're here! Not going to Sweden but to Holland! Can I come back for Christmas with cousins? Yes - but didn't get back for six years - Full time job, salary and expenses in best style of living available - never questioned.

Preparations - gave up nice new little apartment, returned rented radio, packed clothes in three pieces and one typewriter, had dogtag made (unkind to relatives if body not identified) left valuables with Ed - wanted niece to have my grandmother's rings if I were killed - gave brother's address as next-of-kin so he could break news of my demise to Mother gently - passport, visa, ticket, Black Star.

HOLLAND

At English airport - questioned camera, engagement book and address book, but telephoned friends in Foreign Office and Ministry of Information and got them cleared just in time to make plane.

Midday, but plane blacked out - no view - landed in comfortable easygoing Holland - Carlton Hotel in Amsterdam - Room clerk asked how long would I stay? Wasn't sure, but over weekend - Actually stayed six months, broken by trips to Germany, Norway, Belgium and Holland. and Luxemburg

(Brooding corner after Berlin - Sunday Dispatch)

From now on, no subjects given (fire house only one ever given)- telegrams "scheduling 11:48 - 20 11:52 - 10 - the rest were up to me.

Ed's talk - gave me instructions: give human side of war be honest, be neutral, talk like yourself a typical American. (French, and C.B.S. in France didn't understand be neutral. If you weren't for you were against. Matter of principle to me, liked job and why - adventure, quest for truth, contacts with people, independence, self-reliance. I liked it more than any job I ever had, with diplomacy second.

Dutch tried too hard to be neutral, but seem to have learned lesson now. Scripts wore thin when it got to demands.

Hilversum - Baron Tindall - Modern decor

Van Halls - one family of excitable close friends in each country.

Compare Heshettes, Van Halls, Grotes, Preaulx

Trip to border - heard big guns - followed by two men and a boy through snow - watched but not accosted - view over Aachen - Marken - slides on ice, pea soup etc., skating on canals

Life among journalists - brooding corner - How long should one stay? As long as one can get story out (refer to Berlin?) and Victoria Hotel of Germans - one (name) married American, studied in U.S., good-looking etc. Sawin Berlin after I was married when both came to lunch - He told me Rotterdam bombing was unnecessary - Holland had already given in two hours before, planes could have been stopped by radio. He never batted an eye while describing this unnecessary cruelty.

Christmas - describe Hague lunch with Minister George Gordon describe wife - stories about Gordon - threw inkwell at secretary - threw telephone out of window, saw row of bells (not using UP) on his desk - drove people under him to be nervous wrecks - polite to me. Story by American journalist - fourth day of invasion came to office looked up in book to see if he had called (?) previously.

LUXEMBOURG

New Year's - cold in bed in nice little hotel living on endive, good food, cakes, George Platt Waller - thirteen years there - After war I visited from Brussels to call on Grand Duchess and Prince Felix - He adored them

Broadcast - forgot where I was,!

BELGIUM

C.B.S. not interested in story from Belgium, although I tried to sell them on it, so didn't stay long - Editor of Le Soir? Dinner with Embassy friends(who?) Frances Willis appointed Ambassador to Switzerland in 1953, excellent choice and best woman ever in career service. What else?

HOLLAND

Jan 16? Ed and Bill Shirer (describe) arrive for broadcast - both thrilled with lights and food etc. fifteen minute broadcast so I chaperoned them to radio station almost one hour by taxi winter night) both had to think of censors in London and Berlin as they were going back. All friendly-at that time they liked, trusted and respected us. Snowball fight etc. just to release tension of war countries - they cooked up scheme for me to go to Germany to pinch hit for Bill while he went to Switzerland on vacation -

What else about Holland? See diary.

GERMANY

Describe tripup - crossing border where girl jumped out of window where she was held.

Asked by wife of British journalist to take tea to her sister - dumped it out before leaving - didn't want something planted on me, but O.K.

From Marvin Breckinridge

Dear Meg, (Mrs ~~David Woodward~~ (Margaret Rupli))

Here I am in Copenhagen, much to my surprise, on my way to the Altmark in Norway, and I hope to do a broadcast from that country. I'm being flown up by the German government in a special plane with about ten other foreign journalists - two of them American, from A.P. and U.P., and 4 Rundfunk officials and 2 Foreign Office men - it is a great party — we are here overnight, due to darkness and blizzard, and we fly on tomorrow to Stavanger at 6:15 AM! We expect to return within four or five days - so don't tell anyone who might bump us off before Thursday!

This is a fine chance to write you without being 'misunderstood'; I've been meaning to write for ages but have been frightfully busy as Bill (Shirer) has been away for over two weeks and I've done lots of broadcasts - including six in one week (eight days, actually) I saw Jordan and told him you wanted something to do!

I did a marvelous story (not broadcast yet) on an Allied prison camp in Germany, and talked to officers & men from Stalag Luft III, & Rawalpindi etc. I have a lot more material than can go on the air in a limited time, and as I'm the only journalist who has been allowed inside any Allied prison camp, and the only person except welfare workers, I think I can do a swell article on it. Also I've got lots of material on various subjects, and some good jokes to tell you and David.

A package, which was probably the liebesgabe you sent, arrived for Bill but could not be delivered until he returns because it is registered. Would you mind sending me also a package each week for the next three weeks (I expect to stay longer than I first thought) containing coffee, bitter chocolate bars, and butter? And keep careful track of the cost so that I can reimburse you properly, as well as thank you heartily for your trouble.

George Kidd sent a message that David owes him nothing. He's in Copenhagen now, but I don't know where. 3 bags of David's clothes are under his piano in Berlin. I'll see what I can do about them legally, if anything! If you see Mr. Murray of Movietone, tell him his bill is paid. I'll buy the receipt with me. My love to all — and best wishes to the Brooklin Corner —

Affectionately — Marvin

Dear Marvin,

Thanks for the photographs; they're good. I'm glad you sent a set to New York. Incidentally, everyone over there is delighted with the stuff you've been doing, and the Altmark interview was first class.

I saw the articles in the News Chronicle and Telegraph, and thought they were good. In principle, I see no objection to such stories, so long as they don't contain material that would be censorable if it originated from the country concerned, and so long as it's not likely to get our representatives in one of the belligerent countries in trouble. It is often necessary, and wise, to trade a bit of information with journalists.

Where You Go From Where You Are I don't know. At the moment it looks like Scandinavia, and I fear it may be some time before you get those new dresses in Paris.

Dear Gang:

First off I would like to take time out to send mass congratulations for excellent jobs turned in during the past few weeks. I think that without exception the Columbia staffers have performed nobly under the most extraordinarily difficult circumstances, and I want all of you to know that we here are deeply appreciative.

There are a few things, however, that have arisen and I offer the following suggestions in a constructive spirit:

1. I still am having difficulty with some of you getting the news put in properly ahead of a feature piece. One or two of you have used such a device as this: "There has been no news since my last broadcast four hours ago and so now I want to tell you about--." We simply cannot assume that the audience as a whole listened to the broadcast four hours before, and it will be helpful if you take time out to re-state the situation, even if there has been nothing new before getting to the feature. By that I do not mean that we want old news presented as though it were new, but we should have the latest available information on actual news situations before starting down by-paths.

2. I cabled you last week regarding the increased tendency to use horror and atrocity stories. I realize that you are going to hear more and more of them as the days go by and that many of them will be told you on what seems to be reasonably accurate authority. But in the main I would shy away from them unless (1) you have seen the incidents yourself; (2) they are officially announced; or (3) you have absolute confidence in the source. Drawing lessons from the last war, it has become clear that the publication of these atrocity stories frequently results in similar acts on the other side, and thus the stories, if not true at first, lamentably do become all too accurate.

3. At the risk of sounding like a phonograph record, I should like to stress again the vital necessity for objectivity. I wish it were possible for me to send you the reports by Shirer of his recent trip to the front. They stand out as masterpieces of reporting and created an excellent impression here. Not all of you perhaps would be as lyric as one Miss Liana Pomposini of Edri, Pennsylvania, who has inscribed for us a 40-line epic entitled "To William L. Shirer." At the risk of alienating Bill forever, I append the first two verses.

"Like a brooklet gently flowing
Over its rocky bed,
Its murmur keeps on going
Round and round in my head.

"Its dulcet tones are so haunting,
That whether awake or asleep,
My heart it seems to be taunting
To come, and its tryst to keep."

Only a great sense of pity prevents me from quoting the remainder, but I am sending it on to Mr. Shirer and on that happy day when you will be able to see him it may be that he will let you view the complete text -- for a price.

Certain national liquidations with which you are no doubt familiar have resulted in considerable concentration of our forces. As I write, Mr. Shirer and Mr. Hartrich are in Berlin; Mr. Grandin, Mr. Sevareid and Miss Breckinridge in Paris, along with Mr. Leseuer occasionally as he comes back and forth from the front; and Mr. Murrow and Mr. Echlin in London. Mr. Winston Burdett of the Brooklyn Eagle staff is protecting us in Stockholm.

You might be interested to know that we have started still another news service here -- this time to executives within the organization. The number of telephone calls asking, "What's new?" reached the point where as a desperate measure we started mimeographing three times daily a digest of press association and your reports and distributing them throughout the place. Of course, I suppose they could listen to our programs, but that might be asking too much.

That's about all for now. Please be assured that if you don't send me letters I won't think you are mad at me -- but if you do find time, we would all like very much to hear from you.

Regards.

Paul

Talk to Professor Higgins' Graduate Class

"Broadcasting from Europe to America"
~~"The Press Since 1865"~~ 1939-1940

at The School of Journalism of Boston University

Wednesday, December 1, 1976

by Mary Marvin Breckinridge Patterson

Thanks to you, Professor Higgins, and to Ned Grandin for giving me my first opportunity to set foot in a School of Journalism, and, even more than that, to "set down" in a School of Journalism. I feel honored to be invited to speak to you on my experiences while broadcasting from seven countries in Europe on the CBS World News Roundup Program in 1939 and '40 while World War II was on but our country was still neutral.

I propose to tell you how I got into broadcasting, and my unpremeditated but useful preparation, my experience with Edward R. Murrow, war-time problems---including travel and censors, my scripts, and what it takes. I'll welcome questions afterwards

The job came to me quite by chance, through my friendship with Ed~~ward~~ Murrow. I had never thought of ~~media~~ radio work, though I had thought of attending the Columbia School of Journalism during the usual "sophomore slump" (Do you have it here, too?) at Vassar. My parents wisely gave me my head, and an allowance to cover either kind of education, and I returned to graduate from Vassar. I had an idea that I might go into diplomacy, but I did not realize that my courses in modern history, and modern languages (French, German, Italian) would serve me equally well in international journalism. Also, I was one of the founders of the National Student Federation (not to be confused with its successor which may or may not be still in existence). That is where I first met Ed Murrow, at ~~the second~~ a national conference, and after I had bowed out as ~~Vice~~ President in 1928 he succeeded me. ~~and became President~~. The NSFA was a member of the International Confederation of Students whose political activities, curiously enough, foretold what their nations would do in the following few years. I was an observer at the conference in ~~Denmark~~ Copenhagen in 1925, and, after the NSFA was founded, as an ~~f~~ official delegate to conferences in Prague, Paris, Rome, and Budapest, where with other "chefs de Délégations" and the only woman, I met Mussolini. This experience of working with a large international group was a good preparation for dealing with foreigners, ~~including adults~~, and also gave me a few personal friends in several European countries who proved to be good contacts.

Ed did such a good job with the Student Federation that he was enlisted to work for the International ~~Institute~~ Institute of Education in New York. Occasionally when his work brought him to Washington he would take me out to ~~xx~~ lunch. I worked for two years for the Democractic National Committee and later on the Hill for a Democratic Congresswoman. (I don't talk about that much now, as I have switched to the Republican Party.) These jobs gave me some insight into national politics.

Then Ed moved to CBS, and I lost track of him. I went to Africa, from the Cape to Cairo by land and water, not air, in 1932-3, with a close friend and her parents Dr. and Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes who were seriously studying race relations then, with a view to the future. They had introductions to government and university officials, white businessmen and settlers (big farmers) and to many missionaries, mostly working in education, through whom we met a few of the few educated Africans in South Africa. My ~~fix~~ friend kept a lively and interesting diary and I, after only a months schooling but many years of amateur photography, took the pictures for slides to illustrate Dr. Stokes' lectures. When I returned, I found that newspapers and magazines wanted to publish my photographs, as I had had the good fortune to be able to take some unusual and ~~informative~~ interesting subjects. Some of the magazines said 'We like your pictures, but could not publish them unless you write an article to go with them.' So I had to write articles, and I am a bit lazy about writing. Also, I enjoyed the medium, so I took a serious professional year-long course in all phases of it at the Clarence White School in New York. The previous paragraph is not a digression, as it was directly through photojournalism that I got into broadcasting.

In the summer of 1937 I went with my parents, by ship of course, to England for the Coronation, and found Ed Murrow on board with his wife Janet who became a good friend of mine. He was enroute to London as Chief of CBS there to start the first network of American correspondents to broadcast from Europe.

~~Two years later, on the fateful~~

Two years later, on the fateful July 15 (the day of the German-Russian pact) I landed in Europe enroute to cover the Lucerne Music Festival for Town and Country, the Nazi Parteitag, and to do picture stories for other magazines which I had already chosen and lined up.

When the Germans marched into Poland I realized the music festivals etc. were no longer relevant and they and the Partei Tag were cancelled, of course. So I returned to England, planning to return home. But when I saw the long lines of Americans, many with children, leading from Piccadilly Circus to the American Express on the Haymarket, I realized that there was no hurry for me, so I checked in with my photographic agent who had an office in Fleet Street as well as one in New York. They were delighted to see me, as their English photographers had been mobilized and their German and Austrian refugees had become enemy aliens and were not allowed to carry cameras, so there were plenty of jobs ~~for me~~. When I went to register with the British Government as a photographer, I was told that there were only three other Americans, all of whom were staffers for LIFE Magazine so they could not work for anyone else. I was a free-lance, so I could sell to anyone, including LIFE.

Sometimes they sent me on assignment--one of them was to do an interview with photographs of Neville Chamberlain, but more often I thought up my own stories, as I did in America, and they marketed them for me.

One evening when I was having dinner alone with Ed and Janet, ~~as I did from time to time~~, he asked what I had been doing outside London, as he had two shows a day and couldn't leave. I had been doing stories on An English Village Preparing for War, (I had been staying with cousins in Northamptonshire), the evacuated children, and things like that. He asked if I would go on the air that Saturday night, November 18th, and tell about them, and that is how I got into broadcasting!

Ed escorted me home in a taxi and said as he helped me out that he would send me a check in the morning. I did not expect a check for a one-shot like that, and had gone on the air partly because I knew that my parents in California would be pleased to hear daughter's voice (Ed had thoughtfully told CBS New York to telephone them, so that they wouldn't miss the show).

No check came, and that didn't bother me, but I got several telephone messages: please call the Columbia Broadcasting System, please call Mr. Murrow, but I was very busy with my own work. When I did call back he asked if I would spend the night shift in a Fire House in the City of London where they had recently recruited women to man (or woman?) the telephones and do other light work to free the men for firefighting, and find out what they thought about the War, how it had changed their lives, etc. -- the human story. He did not tell me until later that he had all the Vice Presidents of CBS listening in to see what they thought of me. (By the way, out of a total of 50 broadcasts that was the only time a subject was assigned to me--the others I found readily or dreamed up by myself. My show must have been satisfactory, because when I proposed to Ed that he send me to Ireland as I'd like very much to do a story on Irish neutrality (and I'd had plans to visit some friends and ride) he immediately agreed, and said that if that story went well, would I like to go on the regular staff on the Continent after Christmas (it was then early December) and I said yes. I liked that kind of work, whose only tools are pencil and paper (and a portable typewriter) rather than lugging around cameras, films, flash, and contriving to have films developed or spending a lot of time developing and printing in a lab rented by the hour.

In Dublin I was on my own for the first time. I contacted officials of our Embassy and of the Eire government, representatives of the Anglo-Irish, the German Consul, and the people, rich and poor.

I had a run-in with the censor, who did not want me to say that there were more of his countrymen in the British Army than in the Irish, although he admitted it was true. An American friend who was at that time married to an Irish Republican Army type persuaded me to accept his decision, and the show went on.

The broadcasting studio was in an attic, hung in green felt, over the central post office. My instructions gave me the exact number of minutes and seconds that I would be on the air (such as scheduling you 12:50:10 to 12:54:40) and I was allowed a 10-second error, and even up to 30 seconds, but if I ran over I'd be cut off, since a couple of other capitals were called in too. The clock in Dublin was 11 minutes off! That scared me, as a neophyte, and I had no stop-watch. Luckily I also chatted with New York for a minute or two before my show, and that helped. Immediately afterwards I was called into the control room, and through technicians (neither Ed nor I was allowed to talk directly) I got ~~gax~~ the message: "Mr. Murrow wants to know if you will come to London tomorrow and go to Sweden the next day." This was it, the big job! But I parlayed a moment (thinking of my planned visit to Kells) and said "May I come day after tomorrow?" and it was agreed.

When I turned up at CBS, having sat up all night wearing an awkward but obligatory lifejacket across the rough Irish sea, followed by train to London, I looked as if I had slept in my clothes, and I had. Ed said that I was not going to Sweden the next day, but to Holland.

Since it was then the "phony" war, with little military action on land, I asked if I could return to spend Christmas with my English cousins in the country, and he said yes, but I did not get back for six years!

Then we discussed the full-time job as a staffer for CBS, with a salary ~~and~~ (he asked me what I wanted and I said too little) and all expenses in the best style of living available (sometimes splendid, sometimes very uncomfortable).

Ed's instructions were for me to give the human side of the war, to be neutral, to be honest, to talk like myself, a typical American. (He had known me long enough to know what I was like). He said that CBS did not lay down any policy to which its reporters must adhere, and I admire that freedom.

Ed Murrow was a man of intelligence and principle, and in the two years he had been in London he had achieved easy access to the really important leaders, who respected him and his work and were aware of his influence, as the World News Roundup, which went on at 8 a.m. and 7 p.m. E.S.T. had an estimated audience of 22 million. Those who are old enough to have heard him will not forget his way of saying: "This -- is London." He had a sense of the dignity of his profession, and would not do commercials himself. He also disapproved of nicknames (so often artificially used) such as Ed, Bill, etc., so on the air he was always Edward R. Murrow, others were William L. Shirer, Eric Sevareid. When I started broadcasting from Berlin he suggested I use the name Mary Marvin Breckinridge, instead of just Marvin Breckinridge.

I found him to be a very good "boss". The only time he had to correct me he did it with kindness and humor. Almost at the end of one of my first broadcasts from Holland I had a great urge to cough, but managed to suppress it until the end of the sentence, and the broadcast. He telephoned me the next day and said gently "When you feel like coughing, go ahead and cough!" SM

And while preparing for this talk I looked through my papers of the period which a professional from the National Archives had sorted for me (the Archives wants all my papers, films, movies, phonograph records of speeches I made, etc., and I have so deeded them in my Will, and my husband has done the same with his.) Among them I found two letters from Ed which gave me great encouragement at times when I felt far away and lonely and wondered "How'm I doing!" In one, he says "Your stuff so far has been first rate. I am pleased, New York is pleased, and so far as I know the listeners are pleased. If they aren't, to hell with them!" and in another: "Incidentally, everyone over there" (meaning CBS in New York) "is delighted with the stuff you have been doing, and the Altmark interview was first class." That is the way to boost morale of the staff!
When I flew off from London in a plane which was blacked out in full daylight, to the war, not knowing what might happen to me, the Murrows took charge of a couple of family rings that I wanted my niece to have, and my good dresses and riding clothes that were no longer appropriate, and returned them carefully after the war.

On my first broadcast he changed not a word of my script, and his only instruction was to pitch my voice low. Speaking of voice, I have been told that mine comes over well on the radio. I owe this to childhood training by my mother, who would not accept guvamunt for government, nor jenamun for gentleman. During a college vacation I studied briefly with a speech teacher in New York, and later took the Dale Carnegie course in public speaking which brought with it, in the forty sessions, experience in communicating with men and women whom I might not have met in my usual social life.

The command of one's voice is important in radio work, first for clarity and comprehension, and especially when writing through censors. The shading, the timing, fast and slow, the pauses, the stress, all serve to bring out the meaning. For instance, I did a story from Berlin on German newspapers. When I showed it to the mediocre little censor for the Propaganda Ministry he read it and said "You can't give any of it! Knowing that I was due on the air in twenty minutes or so, and feeling deeply worried, I said very innocently "Why not?" He had some reasons, we discussed them, he made some cuts, and he stamped the script so I could go on the air. However he left in my punchline about the Völkischer Beobachter, Hitler's official newspaper, which went as follows:

"The motto of this paper is Freedom and Bread. There is still------- bread." No American would miss the implication.

I had little trouble with censors before arriving in Germany. There Bill Shirer, a past master in writing through them, gave me some good instructions. One example he gave me was his description of a scene on Hitler's birthday. He wrote "A crowd of about 65 persons was massed outside the Chancel-persons was massed outside the Chancellery."

I wrote out my scripts longhand, revised or corrected them, then ~~xxxx~~ copied them on the typewriter. Bill said I should learn to write directly on the typewriter, but I never could --I need to see the words, to smooth them out and to put things in correct order--I suppose the importance of the visual is due to the photographer in me.

It was part of my technique to say something favorable and true, of course, in each story --such as in The Brides' School which was clean and tidy, but the point of the story is the indoctrination into Nazism which they are fed, in addition to their training in housekeeping.

I even found two good things to say about Hitler's regime, though I did not have occasion to use them in my broadcasts. One is that the official newspaper was printed in clear Latin type instead of Old German, and was thus much easier to read, and the other that unoccupied taxis (there were few) showed white lights on their roofs and were easier to find in the blackout. Now many of our taxis do the same.

To get back to Bill, he mentions me in his book "Berlin Diary" but only briefly as we overlapped only for a few days, since I took over from him while he was on vacation.

My "mediocre" censor in Berlin knew the English language well, but not all American expressions, such as "man bites dog" so I could get by with saying, "this story has all the validity (meaning improbability) of man bites dog."

In Berlin there were usually three censors, representing the Foreign Office, the Propaganda Ministry and the Military, and when I spoke on the Women's movement I had four, who all had to approve my scripts and stamp them in the broadcasting office in Adolf Hitlerplatz. Then I would take two copies out the back door into the blackout, down a steep, slippery, icy path, past ~~a guard with a police dog, into a shed where there were several small~~ a guard with a police dog, into a shed where there were several small cubicles. There, I sat at one desk and a technician sat at another with a copy of my script and his fingers on a button to cut me off if I departed from it in any way. That is where I saw my first tape, as he also tape-recorded every word I said.

My usual military censor was a Naval officer and a gentleman who was serving his country this way. I feel sure he was not a Nazi, but of course I would not have said this, for fear of getting him into trouble. When I was having difficulty putting into accurate English the long name of an organization, he suggested we go next door and ask Herr Fröhlich, and that is how I met Lord Haw Haw, an Englishman whose real name was Mr. Joyce.

My greatest shock from a censor came in Holland, when I had carefully worked up an interview with the Dutch Nazi Mussert. One of the conditions for granting the interview was that I must write it up in his headquarters (they let me use the Council Chamber of the Dutch Nazi party, and a terrible old typewriter) and have it approved by his right-hand man, who was brainier than he, incidentally. Mussert spoke English fairly well, and I persuaded him to take a stand on what he would do if Germany should invade Holland. He replied "I would sit with folded arms like this." (What he did do, when that happened three weeks later, was to run through his orchard which led across the German border just before the police came to arrest him.) I wrote carefully, to get by his censor and later the government's. When I got out to the broadcasting studio, the government censor firmly and definitely forbade me to give any of it! However, after showing it to a friend in the Foreign Office the next day I was encouraged to give it in a slightly different form, under the title "Dutch Nazis" as they hoped to trap him. This broadcast brought large headlines on the front page of leading Dutch newspapers and even questions in Parliament. As a result, I was well regarded, and given a reward in the form of an all-day inspection trip on the Dutch cruiser Sumatra along the coast, the only woman except the Queen who had been on board a naval vessel except at parties in port.

If you are interested, in question time I'll read you both the banned version and the encouraged version of my story.

Now that I have discussed censors, I think I should get back to my story and tell you how I got to Berlin.

One cold day in mid-January, Ed Murrow came over from London and Bill Shirer down from Berlin to make a joint broadcast from neutral Holland. They enjoyed the bright lights and the good food, and I conducted them to the studio, about an hour away by taxi from our hotel in Amsterdam. In their broadcasts of 15 minutes each, they compared notes about conditions in England and Germany and spoke carefully, well aware that they had to return to their countries and their censors. We returned to the hotel about 1 a.m. in a beautiful snowstorm, relieved that the show had gone well, they excited by the ~~xxxx~~ street lights, and we had a friendly snowball fight! Then Bill asked Ed if he could have some leave to visit his wife and little daughter in Switzerland before the ground would be ready for the German invasion in the spring. Ed, always the good boss as I said, agreed and turned and asked if I would fill in while Bill was away. Of course I quickly answered yes.

While waiting for the date to go I continued with my broadcasts, though I began to run out of interesting subjects and had to fill in with Diamonds, and Flowers, Fruits and Fish. I also went to the Berlitz School to brush up my German and to learn the correct words for arms of various kinds, aircraft carrier, cruiser, destroyer, etc.

Ten days later I took a long and trying journey by train to Berlin--22 Hours, 4 changes, overnight at the border. In Germany, because of the crowd, I was wedged against the glass window on the platform of the train, so that the sleeve of the trench coat which I wore over my overcoat (it was the coldest winter in many years, and I had come abroad in July for 6 weeks with only summer clothes) was frozen to the window, and I almost had to tear it to free myself. When we arrived, Bill met me on the platform, thank goodness, and escorted me to the heated Hotel Adlon. The next day he introduced me at the American Embassy, the Foreign Office Press Section and the Propaganda Ministry, got me permits, passes and food stamps, and in the evening I covered a big Nazi meeting where Hitler spoke. Bill guided me around midnight to the Rundfunk, several miles away by subway. After feeling our way up the stairs holding on to the railing, we took a half-turn to the right, crossed the snow - covered street avoiding the piles at the sides, past the armed guards, into the lighted and heated offices where I met the officials and censors. They were all polite and agreable and said Heil Hitler while I said Grüss Gott. - The next day Bill was off on his vacation and I was on my own.

Despite many telegrams "scheduling you 12:54:10 to 12:58:50" or some such time, I did have time for some social life, operas, theatres, with a few Germans, my fellow American journalists, and the personnel of the Embassy, one of whom changed my life and career.

After six weeks in Berlin I returned to my regular post in Amsterdam, and to my western journalist friends in the bar of the hotel which we called the Brooding Corner. There are many references to it in my engagement book, and I strongly recommend that you each keep one, to insure accuracy of names, dates, and places. However I never put my personal views in it, nor information which might incriminate anyone, if it were found by the police.

There were several occasions when the German invasion seemed imminent, which were called "periods of tension," and we in the Brooding Corner would discuss how long we should remain if the country were overrun. The best answer seemed to be "as long as you can get your story out." In early May CBS sent a correspondent to Amsterdam, enroute to Berlin, and I left for Paris on the last train that got through--the next day's train was cut off in Brussels by the invasion.

In Paris I helped out Eric Sevareid and Tom Grandin who were trying to get their families out on the last American ship which left from Bordeaux. When I heard through a French friend in the Foreign Office that the government was moving south the next day, I took the train for Genoa, having foresightedly obtained an exit permit ten days before. It was the last train to reach Genoa, as Mussolini gave his famous "stab in the back" speech the next day. Except while I was in Berlin, I had been in constant contact by telephone or letter with Ed Murrow, but after ~~leaving France~~ January, 1940 I did not see him again until after the war. Upon my return to Amsterdam from Berlin, almost three months before, I had telephoned him to check in. I told him I was "going to follow Tom's example" which meant nothing to the censors, but Ed knew that Tom had recently married. He said "Whee"! and I said it was an all-American affair (I didn't want him to think I was marrying a Nazi). So he had plenty of time to find a replacement. People in Holland and France would have been very apprehensive and wary of me if they knew that I was planning to go back to live in Germany.

After a week for visas, enlivened by shelling from the sea and a little bombing, having been chased all around Europe by the German Army, I returned to Berlin and married a career diplomat, the No. 3 man at the American Embassy. Although CBS and Bill Shirer wanted me to continue broadcasting the State ~~Department would not~~ p

Department would not permit it, even under my maiden name, so that ended that career.

Six publishers have approached me to write a book, from 1940 on. At that time I was forbidden to do so by the State Department, and when the ban was lifted some years later my husband was in charge of an Embassy, which meant increasing duties as well as rewards for the wife, and I did not have the time.

Perhaps you would like to hear a very "Cablese" cable which I sent to CBS from Berlin on February 22 when they asked me for material about myself:

Read cable

This book show black book contains copies of my 50 broadcasts, and I had not reread them all in the past 36 years until I began preparing for this talk. Some are xeroxes of the originals, showing what was cut by censors and what I had to cut for lack of time. Others were re-typed as given because the originals were too messy or too faint to xerox. If you are interested, please ask me about them afterwards. One of my favorites is the story of the Altmark.

In conclusion, I would sum up my broadcasting experience by saying that I was very lucky to get the job, I was fortunate in having friends in several countries, and making new ones, and I could not have done it without languages and a general knowledge of Europe.

One must have a liking for people, a sense of adventure, self-reliance, a curiosity to find stories apart from regular news, and a desire to find the truth and express it clearly and fairly. I wish you all well in this great profession.

RADIO BROADCAST NOVEMBER 18, 1939 No. 1
From London

by Marvin Breckinridge

Every part of England is conscious of this war, and baffled by it, but not dismayed. The activities of each community and the life of each citizen is changed from its usual channel.

A short time ago I went to Oxford, a large provincial city as well as a great university center. A Chinese man from the Limehouse district of London, his cardboard gasmask box over his shoulder, went up with me to see his two little daughters who were evacuated there with the rest of their Catholic school. Their classes were held in a Canadian log camp on a fine estate overlooking the town, and they were billetted in a model workman's house. Their father took them down to see a much changed Oxford. Brasenose College has now an Air Raid Warden's Post, and the ancient Gothic-arched entrance has rows of gasproof uniforms that they call decontamination outfits, rubber boots, and scoop-shovels for removing incendiary bombs. The students of Balliol have moved into a corner of their college to allow the Royal Institute of International Affairs to move in from London. The staff sits in the musty library and cuts clippings from foreign papers and prepares digests for the Foreign Office, and even its women eat in the stately dining-hall hitherto reserved exclusively for dons and undergraduates. The most surprising change is that of Ruskin College from the workingman's college to a Maternity Home, full of brand-new babies of mothers evacuated from London. Always famous for the number of its bicycles, Oxford now has even more, because of gasoline rationing, and they have white tailpieces.

For Britain is black -- not only in cities but also in country villages. A woman in a London suburb paints keyholes with luminous paint, and gave me a luminous gull for my buttonhole which frightened me the first time I saw it glowing in the dark. In London, ladies who go out in evening dress, which isn't often, put luminous powder in their hair. The new style of hairdressing is practical, if not always becoming. It calls for shingled neck and rolls on top of the head to cushion the tin hat.

Let's take a quick look at a country town in the shires. The Lord of the Manor is Chairman of the Rural District Council, the Food Executive Committee, and almost all the other committees; his lawyer is Air Raid Warden; his eldest son and heir is an officer in the Scots Guards and the younger son is an instructor in a searchlight battery. The daughter is a volunteer nurse in the local hospital, her husband is in a former Territorials Regiment, and the old nurse, aged 90, knits khaki socks for soldiers. In this town is the oldest wool business in England, now commandeered by the government but still run by the fourth generation of owners. The local engineering works have given up part of their production of milk separators to produce shell-lifters. This is fox-hunting country, and some neighbors have converted their horse-van to hold six stretchers. It is driven by the Head Chauffeur, a wounded veteran of the last war, and 'manned' by the two daughters of the house who are in the Ambulance Brigade. The town has bought a new fire engine, just in case----

At a village on the Thames, on one of the oldest cricket pitches in England, a game of baseball is played every other Sunday afternoon. On one side are diplomats from the American Embassy, with some wives and a child or two; on the other, all in correct uniform, are officers of the (censored: Grenadier Guards) Army, the Navy, the Air Force, a couple of Eton schoolboys, and the ex-Governor of Nigeria who plays in a monocle. And it's not always the Americans who win!

Every night 15,000 women watch over London.

A few nights ago I went on night duty with the women of the Auxiliary Fire Service. Twenty-five hundred of them do night work throughout London's carefully planned fire districts. My station was the chief one in the center of London, which includes the big business and newspaper offices, the theatre district, the Bank of England and St. Paul's Cathedral.

The girls, who are mostly between 18 and 25, live in the fire-house with their officers who are somewhat older. Their work includes telephone communication, record keeping, and driving staff cars, in order to relieve the men for fire fighting. Before the evening shift went on at six o'clock, I went to their quarters where they live tidily, four in a room on mattresses on the floor. They came in from little shopping trips or visits to their families, if they were within seven minutes walk of their fire station. They put on fresh lipstick and adjusted their dark blue caps with red piping, like our lumbermen's caps, to cover their back hair in the rain. Their uniforms consist of dark blue coat with bright buttons that don't need polishing and skirt, (the drivers and late night shift may wear slacks), lisle stockings of maple hue, and black shoes. Then, with tin hats and gas masks in great khaki knapsacks over their shoulders, they clattered down four flights of fire-proof stairs in the great brick building to their offices and control rooms.

One wall had a row of pegs for gas masks and helmets where a waggish fireman drew caricatures of faces with chalk on the shiny tin hats. The girls took their places at telephones, typewriter, and green baize covered table, and the preceding shift picked up their knitting bags and tuppenny novels and went upstairs. The first hour or two was a busy time, with a chimney fire, an explosion in a hospital, a burning taxi and a mobility test, where London taxis with trailer pumps behind were sent to certain points around the district, and their movements were directed, reported and recorded through the A.F.S. They had little time to get on with their knitting or to read their notebooks about fire fighting which are filled with abbreviations for secrecy. Then the telephone was calmer and it was time for the girls to go up to supper, half of them at a time. I was invited to share their macaroni and cheese, bread and butter, pickled onions and tea to the tune of German choral singing on the radio.

While I was helping them dry the dishes afterwards, for the cook was sick, they talked gaily about the food, the movies, and their boy friends, never about the war. Several were engaged, some to A.F.S. men, one to a policeman. A volunteer who had just come in for the evening, after working all day as a stenographer in an office, was knitting a patchwork blanket for evacuees. Now there were no small calls to receive, direct and record, for the lines were kept clear for the (censored: white) signal meaning evening planes over London, and the work they would bring. We could hear the fire engines being warmed up across the hall. The girls are not allowed to smoke on duty, so they picked up their knitting. Their thoughts went back to the last war. One was a schoolgirl in a convent, one a telephone operator at the Admiralty, one was a child in Portsmouth and remembered only soldiers and sailors always marching by, another was a volunteer nurse, the man officer had been torpedoed in a merchant ship, and the very young girl at the typewriter added brightly "I wasn't here"!.

I went down through a maze of sandbag walls to the district control room in the basement where two girls and a pet cat were watching seven silent telephones, and joking with two of the men officers of the London Fire Brigade. The telephone rang, and it was the 'all clear'. The girls ran down the row of telephones passing on the news, which took six seconds for each call, including the inevitable thank-you.

The night shift was still on duty, but others could go to a school across the street to play badminton or to rehearse for their Christmas pantomime.

While I was still in the Control Room the chief officer, head of 700 women AFS in the district, came in for a brief visit. The girls stood at attention, but did not salute, because that is only done when both women, officer and private, have hats on, and the officer had no hat on her hair which is waved regularly by a hairdresser who comes to do all the officers. She had been a leading advertising woman at a high salary until she chucked her job to take on the A.F.S. at the same £ 2 a week, now about eight dollars, for officers and privates alike. Although she is addressed as 'Madam' by everyone under her, she is not too dignified to join in the weekly dances for men and women of the A.F.S. and do the 'palais glide' and 'boompsy daisy' with hearty good spirits.

The next shift came in, wearing slacks, carrying blankets, pillows, novels, and a thermos of coffee. The one whose turn it was took the only comfortable chair, another lay on the floor, a third passed around a jar of candy and settled into her novel. They looked peaceful, but they are always watching....

When my ship left England at four o'clock in the morning every porthole was covered by an iron shutter, canvas was hung along the decks and only a faint glimmer of light lit up the gangplank which led from the London train to the boat, for all of England is blacked out.

Three hours away lies neutral Ireland where they stopped blacking out a couple of weeks after the war started as it was unpopular and unnecessary. The six northern counties of Ireland are strictly dark I am told, but Dublin, a plain city by day, seems cheerful by night with bright shop windows and and illuminated signs, to one who has just come from London. I also noticed the lack of sandbags, airraid shelter signs, and gasmasks, and the sound of sirens still startles me, as in England they are used only for air raid warnings. There are quite a lot of automobiles in the streets, although gasoline rationing is approximately the same as in England, but some horse-drawn vehicles still remain. As I drove about Dublin in a horsecab, rich in odor and atmosphere, with a driver to match, and saw a little train loaded with beer barrels crossing the street, a few soldiers from Ireland's army of 15,000, who are now increased by an unannounced number of volunteers wearing lighter uniforms and side caps, women with children in bright red or green raincoats and hats shopping in the stores, where prices have gone up since the beginning of the war. Sugar has gone up nearly 50%, coal about 25%.

The feeling of the great majority in Ireland has been in favor of neutrality, which was declared and recognized in the first few days of the war and the government is determined to stick to it. This is the first time that Ireland has had the opportunity of voting on a war. (Censored: The people feel it is not their war, and while there is little sympathy with German principles there is at the same time a historical feeling toward England that prevents sympathy for her side.) Irish nationalists, a German Legation spokesman, and the Anglo-Irish agree that Great Britain has not brought pressure to bear to force Ireland to join the Allies, although it is the only part of the British Commonwealth nations not to do so. As John Maffey, Special Representative of Great Britain, said to me yesterday: Since England's attitude in this war has been to lead the field against all forms of aggression and to stand for the liberty of thought and action of small countries, it recognizes the right of Ireland to decide for itself.

Although Ireland is neutral and intends to remain so, the war has affected her national life. The cost of living has gone up 6-1/2 percent, income tax is up to 6 shillings and sixpence on the pound, compared to 7/6 in England, shipping except to England has practically stopped, the last American ship left last week, and the Irish merchant marine consists of about three or four ships to Holland and Belgium and a couple of cattle ships are practically inactive.

The completion of the new broadcasting station has been delayed because of the difficulty of obtaining iron and steel from England.

The government has taken measures intended to preserve its neutrality, including the increase in the size of the army, (Censored: the purchase of one torpedo boat,) the establishment of a small air force, and the intensification of the self-supporting policy whereby Ireland can already feed itself and may later export to the English market, given time and a satisfactory price, butter and bacon, the two foods which will be rationed there next month. Already "four little pigs go to market, and six little pigs stay at home"'.

(Censored: Because its currency is controlled by England, Irish people have to get permits, which have so far never been refused, to take money out of the country.) Strict censorship has been enforced since the beginning of the war, letters are opened, and newspaper dispatches censored. (Censored: In warring England, my radio script is checked by one censor in the broadcasting station, in neutral Ireland it is checked by two government departments in different parts of Dublin.)

There is still a German Minister and Secretary in the Legation here, who told me this morning that there were only between 200 and 300 Germans in Ireland now, and there is no direct connection whatever with Germany. They are evidently planning to stay, because they have just repainted the front door of the office.

Dublin people are interested in the war in varying degrees. A young waiter in a downtown restaurant has a number of schoolfriends in the Royal Air Force and Navy, (Censored: and there are Irish regiments formed in London, but none over here.) I asked two little boys on their way to confession what they knew about the war. The 9 year old knew that there was a war on, but not who was fighting; the 8 year old knew that England and Germany was fighting, but no more. Their elders are better informed, and the central library reports a large demand for Hitler's Mein Kampf, and a lesser demand for other books on contemporary European politics.

Yesterday I went into the newsroom of the library, where about fifty men of the poorest type were reading periodicals. All around the walls were desks with spread-out newspapers, almost all from England, and one or two men standing to read each paper. All but two of the men were reading about the invasion of Finland, and those two were reading about markets and positions vacant.

Despite these preparations, life goes on calmly enough. In the country there is still hunting, though fewer people join in. One can still read in the local social columns that a young lady "will not hunt for the present, owing to the death of her grandfather" not the war! At the beginning of the war, several whole stables of English race horses were sent here for safety.

In Dublin people are interested in the Christmas Fair which will be held at the Mansion House next week; in the well-known theatre companies and the numerous amateur groups; in the farmers strike which has just been settled; in the "caileys" or dances which are held by social and political clubs; in Irish products such as tweeds, bath salts, lace, tinned food, and whisky, and hats; in the meetings of the Dail, where I sat behind the fence in the visitors gallery like a monkey in a zoo, and listened to a discussion of the pig marketing board, aided by an illuminated scoreboard for committees, order of business and amendments.

The Anglo-Irish people who derive their traditions and culture from England are loyal to that country. Those who are in the Services cannot now return to Ireland for the duration of the war, because they are not allowed to wear anything except their uniforms, and the Irish government has just announced an order today forbidding the wearing of all except Irish uniforms.

The rest of the population is quite as much interested in the union of northern with southern Ireland as in the fate of European countries. Their own history has absorbed their attention to the exclusion of other countries and their futures. That is the explanation of her neutrality.

December 10, 1939 Holland Final Draft

Holland cannot feel really free while a state of war exists all around her. Everywhere are soldiers in green uniforms, guarding airports and stations, riding bicycles stiffly around the Rembrandtsplein, joking with passengers on trains. I saw one passenger give a soldier a helpful shove when he got stuck in the door of a crowded train because of his regulation load of four knapsacks, blanket, bayonet, helmet and rifle.

In the parks are covered trenches for air raid shelters, but one Dutch woman, who did not believe war would come to her country, told me she much preferred to stay in her spotless tiled kitchen than to go to the earthy shelters.

Food rationing, to prevent hoarding, began here about four weeks ago, but so far only sugar is affected everywhere. Gasoline is not rationed, so the streets of Amsterdam are full of cars, and at night their brightly-lit windows sparkle with new merchandise. Ski clothes are featured and I am told that people will go to Switzerland, rather than to Austria this year.—The finest paintings of the Dutch School are stored for safety in the basement of the great Rijksmuseum.—Children have just celebrated St. Nicholas' Day, when he rides around the canals on a barge and they receive presents in their shoes.—The Delft china factory is still running, but on half-time.

Hollanders are not very nervous, but they are taking care in little ways and great to preserve their neutrality. In a newsreel theatre, I noticed that among Dutch and other subjects, there were two from Germany, two from France, two from England. The Russian orchestra leader at one of the leading hotels told me that he had been requested by the management not to play the English song-hit "Hanging Up the Washing on the Siegfried Line" for fear of offending some of the guests.

Holland has armed all her frontiers, and she has refused to use convoys and to arm her merchant ships. The Dutch have felt the limitations of the British blockade, and now they are annoyed by their threat to stop all exports from Germany, for their shipment is an important part of Holland's business.

A pretty girl of twenty, daughter of a Captain in the Merchant Marine, told me that besides helping with the housework and studying to be a dancing-teacher in the daytime, she gives four evenings a week to Air Raid Precautions work. Neither she nor any of the 8000 other volunteer women in the Hague wears a uniform, because Dutch people as a whole dislike them.

One of her sisters is a nurse, ~~and~~ her aunts knit socks and caps for soldiers. ~~I asked whether she had any friends at home to take her to the movies, and she said they were all~~ her friends are all in the Army or Air Force "otherwise they are not my friends."

At the Hague, I saw two squads of sailors marching, and passed an iron pillbox labelled 'Manchester, England' on my way out to the Peace Palace, home of the Court of International Justice. Its treasures of painting and tapestry have been stored for safety. The porter told me that a conference between Belgium and Bulgaria had ended this week, the judges had gone, and even the secretaries moved out yesterday. Soon I went too, and left the porter alone in the Peace Palace, in the cold rain and deepening darkness.

FOREIGN JOURNALISTS

Holland has become the crossroads for the news of the world. Before the war, there were only about seventy journalists representing foreign newspapers here, and a third of them were Dutchmen, none Americans. Now there are about sixty new foreign journalists here, including American, English, French, and German, of whom the Germans are the most numerous.

Only one new correspondent stays at Rotterdam. A few are at the Hague, including a German woman who reports on cultural matters. The only other foreign woman journalist in Holland is an Englishwoman who, as she said to me, "specializes in wars, aviation, and personality interviews", distributed through her own syndicate. In the Hague also are the Press Attaches of several legations, whose task, ~~consisting of interpreting their countries to Holland and vice versa, has not been altered much by the war,~~ has changed little except that they are sometimes called upon to get their journalists out of trouble.

But the main center of world news is Amsterdam. Our big agencies have sent Americans to augment their staffs. They sit shirt-sleeved in steam-heated offices under electric light by day and night, and gather news from all Europe to relay it to other points, mainly to the United States.

The biggest foreign agencies have their offices on the edge of a canal, in an old Dutch building belonging to the semi-official ~~and only~~ Dutch agency. Here on the top floor are two doors facing each other. On one side is the dnp - Deutches Nachrichten Bureau - the semi-official German news bureau. Across the hall is a room for the English representative of Reuter's and the four French representatives of Havas. Each office has a teleprinter which is constantly typing out news of the world from seven agencies ~~from all the world~~. Dutch boys carry messages to one side of the hall, and then to the other, for there is no direct contact between the two sides. None of these three agencies is allowed a representative in an enemy country, of course. So what they have done, like many individual English and German papers, is to take men, ~~often the heads,~~ from the bureaux in the opposite capitols and send them to Amsterdam. That means that the G[illegible] England and the English come here to get news of Germany. One German correspondent told me that he subscribed to all the leading English papers and magazines, and used that material, together with agency and radio news, and reports of neutral travellers, to write his articles on England for eight large provincial German papers.

There is only one Frenchman representing a single newspaper-group. He was formerly editor of the Sports Section and travelled continuously for sporting and semi-political news. He told me that, measured by kilometres, he was the greatest sports-writer in Europe!

About two hundred more journalists, including among them Italians, Japanese, and Hungarians, have come here to do special articles and then left . Some have gone to Helsinki, much of whose news comes back via Amsterdam to the outside world. The writers who are left here sometimes get restless at the lack of dramatic news in Holland itself. They meet almost daily at their regular table next to the black and white bar at the Carlton, ~~when I joined them this afternoon~~, to drink a large beer or a small 'bols', (which is a Dutch gin,) where I joined them ~~this afternoon~~ today. Rumor has it that when there is no news, this group arranges some. The Germans do not join this group; they go to another hotel, but most of them are in the Hague anyway.

~~For their expenditure, newspapers expect a lot of news, and they get masses of it.~~ The German and English reporters telephone their messages to their papers. The French and German agencies have teleprinters direct to their capitols. Cables from the Netherlands have increased 60 to 70 percent since the beginning of the war, in spite of the drop in ordinary business. About a month ago, Press Wireless opened an office in Amsterdam, the only one in a neutral country, which I visited night before last. While I was there, telephone calls came in from Helsinki and Bucharest, and were sent by teleprinter to London. Other messages go by Dutch Radio to the United States, and every day about 28,000 words go through this office; ~~in a crisis many more~~.

Netherlanders have boasted to me that there is no censorship in their country. However, ~~most European countries feel that some supervision is necessary in wartime, and~~ the Dutch are anxious above all things to preserve their neutrality, and They are occasionally embarassed by the activities of some of the foreign journalists, (notably about five weeks ago,) so they have installed a kind of censorship whose purpose is 'the security of the State'. Telegrams and telephone calls are censored by the Post Office which despatches them, and other quick methods of transmission are watched. No letters are opened by the Dutch, the idea being, and it seems true enough, that mails are so slow in wartime that nothing is 'news' which arrives by mail. Radio has always been ~~censored~~ supervised by the Post Office ~~for public welfare and morality,~~ and now there is a military censor as well.

Tomorrow morning, when you open your newspaper, think of this hive of words buzzing in and buzzing out when you read the dateline: December 16th, Amsterdam.

HOLLAND'S FRONTIERS

Number 6

By Marvin Breckinridge

December 21, 1939

From Holland

The three frontiers of Holland are all fortified, as evidence that she is truly neutral in this war, and I have just returned from visiting them to get a tourist's-eye view.

First, I bicycled from the Hague to Scheveningen on the coast, across the North Sea from England. Here three old fishermen in black corduroy trousers and wooden shoes were smoking their pipes outside one of a series of pillboxes. Where the entrance to the smart beach club is in summer, there is now a neat trench camouflaged by wire netting and bearing a sign meaning 'Photography Forbidden'. Some pink-cheeked young soldiers were digging another trench while others played football on the tremendous beach below. The people paid no attention to the granite monument to the mobilized forces of the years 1914-1918. They are living that period again.

Later I crossed the partly-frozen water-barrier which protects the Central part of the country and made a three-hour train journey to southern Limburg, a hilly section of Holland which reaches south between Belgium and Germany.

(Censored: ?? In this section a kind of martial law prevails and suspicious foreigners are deported within half a day of their arrival.) Though undoubtedly well defended, this country shows few signs of guns, trenches, and supply depots. The fortifications are heavily guarded and fields are mined. The towns have air raid shelter signs here and there, but no sandbags or other signs of warfare. Notices have appeared in the Dutch papers requesting civilians not to travel by train on Saturday or next Wednesday, to leave room for the soldiers coming home on Christmas leave. The German soldiers across the way, it is reported, are not getting any leave this Christmas.

After bicycling through the cobbled square of Maastricht, with its new forest of Christmas trees, I went out through frosty fields to the Belgian border. A brand-new concrete pillbox stood in an orchard, others were outlined on the tops of surrounding hills. On the Belgian side were sentries in groups of three around every corner, guarding the Albert canal, and politely forbidding all foreigners, including me, to cross the bridge.

In the opposite direction from Maastricht, across the river Maas, or Meuse as the French call it, lies the German border, less than twenty miles away. All the bridges on the highway to the border are barricaded by rows of concrete cylinders, and sawhorses draped in barbed wire. (Censored??: Each bridge has a guardhouse midway across, with fully-armed sentries outside.) There are also a number of tank traps consisting of rows of short steel girders sticking out of the ground, or cobblestone walls across the road, leaving just room enough for my bus to squeeze through.

At Vaals the snow fell on men who were decorating this frontier town's Christmas tree, as high as the inns around the old square, and fifty yards from the frontier were the Nazi flag was flying. Two military police, white braid hanging from their shoulders, were patrolling the town slowly on bicyles. I saw only a couple of other soldiers here, and learned later that they are not allowed near the frontier.

In another town, Kerkrade, life was going on much as usual: the baker's wife was putting big gingerbread hearts in the window, and little girls went home from school carrying the Christmas presents they had made for their parents. Yet in the middle of this town is a street bisected lengthwise by the German-Dutch frontier. Soon after four the street-lights of neutral Holland went on on one side of the street, but the German side remained black, for they observe the national blackout of all belligerent countries. So the town is still divided, and Holland is still bright.

go ahead Luxemburg

RADIO TALK #7

by Marvin Breckinridge Dec. 30, 1939

LUXEMBURG

Luxemburg has more pastry shops than any city I've ever seen! This means two things: first, the people work hard every day to earn their bread; and second, it is not only bread but cake. They took literally the advice to 'Let Them Eat Cake'! For this is one thousand square miles of the most prosperous country on earth.

But now Luxemburg is on the spot. Belgium lies on the west. France's Maginot Line borders her on the south, and Germany's Siegfried Line on the east, and they both meet at the southeast tip of the country, twelve miles from the capitol, where actual fighting goes on from time to time.

Day before yesterday I motored down there, ~~[illegible] 25 [illegible] remaining here. [illegible] French border~~. Across the which is the bord ravine, French villages had been evacuated, and the little stone bridges were barricaded by farm implements, ~~one, by a single telegraph pole~~. I saw only one French soldier over there. But on this side I had to show my permit to visit the area to 2 per cent of the entire Luxemburg army! For the whole army numbers only 300, and their task is to prevent incidents which might endanger their neutrality. It was a cold day, well below freezing, so the weather was fine for killing pigs, and I saw several farmers working on great white corpses spread on ladders. ~~[illegible] down into the Moselle valley, the grapevines stand out in black designs against the snow, and~~ In one of the villages in the Moselle Valley within sight of the German border, ~~where they were probably doing the same thing,~~ men were washing out large vats for the famous Moselle wine. In a field overlooking the German and French borders I could see little in the cold grey light but I stopped to listen. Very far away was the sound of big guns. Nearby, there was only the sound of church bells ringing through the frosty air.

Luxemburgers near that crucial point have been evacuated, but a village schoolmaster told me that elsewhere in the country nothing was changed. I have asked a number of people here in the city if daily life has changed since the beginning of the war and they all answered 'No'. But people are more depressed, or nervous, they say.

There are now a certain number of unemployed, where before the war there were none. New houses are not being started, so masons are out of work. Banks and holding companies, for which this is a great center, are handling less business, or temporarily moving their headqu and therefore dismissing employees. And the well-known Radio Luxemburg, which subsisted on advertising from English, French and Belgian firms, has been closed by order of the government to preserve the country's neutrality.

But more people suffer from fear of the future than from present circumstances. The owner of a leading piano renting store told me that 34 pianos had been returned within one week. A secretary keeps her good furniture in storage, instead of putting it into her new apartment, because she would be sorry to have to leave it suddenly. My hairdresser said that business was all right, but that she now had to pay 2 francs 20 for soap instead of 1 franc as before the war.

The cost of living has gone up, especially the cost of gasoline, but nothing has been rationed. Life is quiet here, and the four movie theatres, the restaurants and cafe-concerts all close at eleven since the war began. More serious is the future of the important iron and steel works for possible lack of German coke to burn, and French freight cars for transport.

There are no measures for military defence (beyond the army of 300!) but the Grand-Duchy is working on Passive Defence. Neat little red and white signs indicate Air Raid shelters, and there are fifteen miles of passages under this rocky fortress where hundreds of people could take refuge. Red Cross posts have been established, and distribution of gas masks began last week. Yesterday afternoon I went into the auditorium in the basement of the City Hall and watched an official and two firemen fitting gasmasks, made in Belgium, on the handfull of people who were ready to pay fifty francs (about two dollars) for them. On a fine square, behind the French Legation, stands a monument dedicated by Foch to all the Luxemburg volunteers who fought for France last time. [~~There will be no monument after this war, because now Luxemburgers are not allowed to volunteer in any foreign army.~~ forbidden to fight on either side.]

But many things continue as usual. Yesterday The local Rotary Club held its weekly lunch meeting in my hotel, and ~~yesterday~~. * Two business men ~~officials~~ whom I went to see had taken their dogs ~~and hunters~~ and gone hunting, for this is the season for hare and wild boar. ~~pigs~~ Others just stay at home and read the local newspapers, four in German, and one in French. Everyone here can read.

This morning a big market was held outside the Cathedral. On the altar inside is the figure of Our Lady of Luxemburg, who, they say, has saved this Catholic country from destruction for over four hundred years, in answer to prayers. In early November, 1918, when the country was in danger of destruction from the retreating Germans and the pursuing Allies, women prayed before this altar night and day, and the country was saved by hours, by the Armistice. Yesterday morning, when I went to see Our Lady, the sun streamed through ~~bright~~ stained-glass windows on three nuns, praying.

by Marvin Breckinridge — Shipping in Holland — Jan. 12, 1940

[We take you now to Amsterdam]

The war has seriously affected Holland's leading industry, that of shipping. Rotterdam was formerly the greatest port by tonnage on the Continent, three quarters of it foreign. As it is the natural port, via the Rhine River, for the German hinterland which provides more than half of its trade, it has suffered most heavily from the British two-way blockade of German goods. The delays and restrictions of the blockade annoy the Dutch, but they regard it as the lesser of two evils.

A few days ago I rode around Rotterdam harbor on the deck of a little open tug plowing through acres of churned-up ice to return sailors to their ships. I saw a few Dutch ships laid up, a couple of Swedish ships, a Greek, and several Italian ships taking on cargoes of coal. One of their sailors chatted gaily with the Dutch master of the tug in English, ~~the language of the seas,~~ before climbing up the ladder of his ship encumbered by his bundles. Modern grain elevators and countless cranes stood idle, for all shipping has decreased by 75 % since the beginning of the war. This has thrown three-quarters of the dockworkers out of their jobs, who ~~Supported by minicipal relief, they spend~~ spend their time fishing, or nowadays skating on long, turned-up skates. *

Dutch ships, now chartered by the government but operated by their owners, are all busy bringing supplies for home consumption, but it is not very profitable because of the higher cost of operation. ~~Companies are barely holding their own, or losing money slightly, because of higher costs of labor, fuel, and above all war risk insurance, and they expect to lose more.~~

Although the two biggest passenger liners to America are not in transatlantic service, the other ships run full westbound, to the extent of 2000 passengers monthly, ~~90%~~ 80% of whom are German refugees. The biggest westbound business was when this line repatriated over 4300 Americans who rushed here from Germany and other neighboring countries at the beginning of the war. The ships return now practically empty, due to war conditions and our new neutrality law, and they carry some mail which is searched in the ~~English~~ Downs. ~~The American Government has recently made a formal protest against the interception of the mail from neutrals to neutrals, but~~ by the British, both ~~still~~ despite our protest do it in order to stop the tremendous flow of dollar bills to Amsterdam bankers, and thence, with a profit of course, to Germany where they go to pay for new submarines.

Amsterdam is the port for traffic with Holland's colonies which are sixty times larger than herself. But her fine ships no longer brave the North Sea; they sail from Lisbon and Genoa; the passengers join them by train, and cargo is brought by tenders equipped with paravanes for cutting off attached mines. ~~They are useless against magnetic mines, of course.~~

The Harbormaster of Amsterdam welcomed me into his map-hung office in the ancient tower, built about 1450, whence Henry Hudson sailed to America. He told me that only half as many ships called as before the war, and unemployment had increased by a third. ~~As I walked along the quay, its cobbles covered with ice, I saw boxes from Italy and flour from Texas being loaded into canal barges for the interior of Holland.~~

~~No American ships are allowed in Dutch waters;~~ A few English ships come as ~~far as Amsterdam~~, but no other ~~foreigners~~. German ships go only to Delfzijl, a small port in the north near their boundary. It is near here that the minefields of Germany, Holland, and England meet, or maybe overlap. The sailors who cross the North Sea talk little, but all say they have seen floating mines, and sometimes they explode them by rifle-fire. Holland has lost seven ships by uncharted mines, and two by torpedo.

I was in the little harbor of Maasluis one afternoon when three minesweepers came in to join ~~the~~ a bright red lightship, ~~(for all lightships have been kept in harbor since the war,)~~ and I talked to the young naval officer who was checking them in. The Netherlands have a purely defensive navy of some 15000 men, with no battleships or aircraft carriers, and 75% of the navy is in the East Indies. Here, its task now is ~~directing the installation of~~ putting paravanes on Dutch ships, minelaying and -sweeping, and rendering harmless the dozens of mines that are washed up on beaches by a westerly gale. I am told that the Minister of Defence says he will take up some of the minefields near bathing beaches next summer.

In spite of bloakade and mines, which are ruining its ports through elimination of foreign ships and cargo, this seafaring nation continues to run its own ships all over the world, with 'Holland' in eight-foot-high letters on each side and a spotlight on the Netherlands flag at night, professing their belief in the safety of neutrals.

RADIO TALK #9

by Marvin Breckinridge ICE IN HOLLAND Jan. 15, 1940
Morning

Yesterday at midday it was announced here that no new leave for Dutch soldiers would be given and that the road and railroad communications between Maastricht in southern Holland and Liege in Belgium had been cut, because of a rumor of a foreign army assembling near Holland's frontiers. Just before Christmas I travelled through this part of the ~~country~~ Netherlands. Then I saw crowds of villagers skating on parts of the water barrier, against a background of misty windmills, like an old-fashioned print come to life. For this has been so far an unusually severe winter, and the remarkable ice has affected the military and economic life of the country and delighted its sportsmen.

Attacks over the ice were unsuccessful when tried by the Russians in the last war and again in this one in Finland, because of lack of cover and because artillery fire from either side has a devastating effect in breaking the ice under the advancing army. Now the Dutch are controlling their unique defenses by sending soldiers to break up the ice and by moving the water from one section to another of the water barrier by windmill and pump and thus leaving cracks six feet wide, and great blocks of upturned slanting ice, most difficult to cross. They say that none of the ice will support tanks, except in the marshy country of North Brabant, where it will pack hard and make a better roadbed than the soft, shallow marsh water. Last week a newsreel was released showing whole battalions of water-barrier troops drilling on ice-skates. This is not new, for when the Spaniards attacked them on foot about three hundred years ago, slipping on the ice in their heavy armor, the Dutch had a good laugh first, and then came up on skates and easily defeated them.

On the former Zuyder Zee, now called the Ijsselmeer, which forms part of the defense of central Holland, the ice ~~was~~ is over a foot thick, and strong, for I saw a dozen cars parked near together off the shore of the island of Marken. I spent Saturday there- a beautiful, sunny day, when thousands of Hollanders come to skate with villagers in native costumes. I set off on my Dutch wooden skates with steel blades along the smooth, well-swept iceway which extends for three miles to the island, accompanied by a young soldier, an air observer, formerly a baker. He told me he had been out there the day before when five weddings were held on the ice near the island, with two hundred couples in costume, and tables on the ice for a gigantic wedding feast. Fishermen swept by us on long skates, often over socks, the shoes sticking out of the pockets of their spacious Dutchmen's breeches. Women with long locks of hair falling from under white caps were serving pea soup and hot chocolate and chewy gingerbread at little stands on the ice. The usually-serious Dutch become gay and lively when they play on the ice, and there is a saying "When Holland freezes, the Dutch thaw". Ice is also a means of transportation, and one child psychologist I know skates from her home in Leiden, our pilgrim fathers' temporary home, to the Hague for committee meetings.

Now that the canals are frozen, many barges are stuck. Some are used for storing supplies for safety from possible bombing, since they can be moved about when it thaws, Now even the Rhine is frozen, and Dutch ships cannot get as far as Mannheim, their wartime limit, since beyond that the Rhine forms the frontier between France and Germany. The ice in the ports of Amsterdam and Rotterdam and their waterways is kept broken by special icebreakers, and by tugs with red flags over the bows to warn that steel blades are cutting under water. There is little water to be seen — only vast stretches of ground-up ice.

Yesterday's defense measures have been taken calmly by the people here, and there are no further developments reported today. Last night I had Sunday night supper with a charming Dutch family. After the two little children had come in in their blue woolly wrappers to kiss us goodnight, we turned on the radio for news and heard about the curtailing of leave and the closing of the Belgian-Dutch frontier, which did not worry my hosts much as similar measures had been taken repeatedly during the last war. We also heard the announcement of the meeting of the Dutch Cabinet indicating that demands had possibly been made, which was more serious since it paralleled recent history in other parts of Europe. Still my friends, like the rest of their countrymen, were calm, ready to face the future, and confident that ice does not help the attacker.

But now we have the first thaw in many days, the temperature this morning is 38 degrees. It has discouraged the sportsmen, who have had to postpone their biggest skating race today, when 3000 men and women were to have skated well over a hundred miles between eleven towns. But the thaw has not yet freed the barges, nor weakened the thick ice which girdles central Holland, for better or for worde.

And if the enemy attacks, it will find determined resistance, for "Holland on Ice" will not be a present.

DIAMONDS IN HOLLAND

By Marvin Breckinridge — From Holland — Number 10 — January 23, 1940

One luxury business that has not lost by the war is the diamond industry, whose headquarters for some three hundred years have been in Amsterdam.

Excepting a few from South America, all the rough stones come from South Africa. When I was there a few years ago, I peered into the Big Hole, a giant' well, famous for the richness it produced. I also went into the sorting room of the great De Beers company in Kimberly and saw spread out on a long table beneath bright windows enough diamonds to fill the world market for five years. The discoveries of more of these jewels lying on the shores of African rivers threatened the industry, by reducing values, so the various companies formed a syndicate which now controls all important diamond lands.

But now the war has increased the uncertainty and added to the expense of transporting the rough stones from South Africa to London, the great center, where Holland gets 98% of her supply. One result has been an increase in price This morning a Dutch diamond executive told me he had telephoned London and found that in the market the 'tendency was firm'. As a war measure, England will not allow any rough diamonds to come to Holland without guarantees that they will not be re-exported for industrial purposes. The important industrial use now is, of course, in the making of armaments.

Today I visited Asscher's, the greatest diamond polishing works in the world, employing a couple of hundred workmen. It is a family business, run by the many sons and grandsons of the founder. Though they are now the manager and representatives for Paris, London and New York, they all started by working with their hands in the shops at the age of 14 or so, like the apprentices in the school for diamond cutters which gives part of its training here.

In this factory I saw the three big stages of polishing. First comes sawing, in a room with 300 machine saws revolving at the rate of 5000 times a minute. As 'only a diamond can work a diamond', the copper saws are edged with diamond-dust in oil. Cutting comes next. Finally it is given to the polishers, middle-aged men who have been with the company an average of 22 years. They sit at a bench in a long, light room made even brighter by the snow outside. Most of them wear grey linen coats and smoke the potent Dutch cigars. Their job is to cut the facets, with hand and machine under accurate eye. 58 facets in a round diamond is called the classical form. I was surprised to see a few playing cards on the workbenches, and was told they are used for making minute changes in adjustment of the holders instead of for games No, the suits were not all diamonds--

The famous Cullinan diamond, largest ever found, weighing uncut over 3000 carats, was brought here to be cut into eleven pieces and polished, and the largest two are in the Crown and Scepter of the King of England.

In Amsterdam is the important 50-year-old diamond exchange, the only one in Europe except for Antwerp. Here buyers with magnifying glasses stuck in their eye-sockets lean low over tables to examine the jewels, or weigh them on little scales. Forty to fifty million dollars' worth a year go through their large, modern safe. The wholesale price may be anywhere from $3 to $300,000 per stone. Prices for small diamonds have gone up 40 -50% since the war started, and the merchants say they will be higher.

In Europe now people buy some diamonds for investment, but as a whole the sales here have fallen off. However, the business has not suffered because the best market in this international trade is the United States, and the Netherlands look to us to keep alive the bright sparkle of diamonds in a murky world.

HOLLAND'S FLOWERS, FRUITS, FISH

This is the story of the flowers that wont bloom in the spring. For Holland, which has been the nursery of Europe for many years, has lost all her best customers through the war. England used to buy half of the 50,000 tons of bulbs grown every year; now it takes none. The 20,000 acres where they grow are lying under snow, but in the spring many of the bulbs will be burned, and beets will be planted in their place, for sugar. Bulbs were brought to Holland from Persia almost four hundred years ago, and together with cut flowers and plants they form an important export industry.

Yesterday I went to the flower capitol at Alsmeer, through little villages that all had posters urging people to "Support Finland" by the collection which will be made on Saturday. I drove past miles of greenhouses, some with double-glass walls and icycles hanging from the roofs. This week we've had the coldest weather since 1897, which makes it more expensive to heat the glass houses. And when the many small nurserymen finally bring their flowers to the cooperative auction, there will be very likely no bidders for them. In the blue and white auction-room, I sat near the top of the steep row of benches with one of the leading orchid-growers of the country, who has 30,000 plants in his extensive greenhouses. We watched the double-decker trucks about twice as big as stretchers, piled high with lovely white lilacs like the snowdrifts outside, being pushed into the center of the room. The coffee-drinking buyers below us pressed buttons at their desks to record their bids on a stalk of none of them bids as much as three cents per stalk, the truck was wheeled out and another brought in to meet the same fate of immediate destruction, or possibly to be given to a hospital. Tumbril after tumbril of lilacs rolled by. Seventy percent of these used to go to England, and now because of currency regulations, and probably less interest in flowers, none of them go. And France no longer buys her favorite roses, nor Germany her favorite daffodils, and it is small comfort that Switzerland still wants her tulips, and Scandinavia still buys her orchids, sent by air.

In a packing-room off the warehouse, a man was filling each orchid to be shipped with cotton, and wrapping each part in soft tissue-paper for safety. Outside the window was a bicycle pushcart piled high with yellow, red and blue wooden shoes which the pedalling salesman was selling to the workers. These workers and gardeners have their own brass band, and play in the large carnation warehouse after hours. But they dont need to blow to keep their courage up -- for although the flower business which used to be worth four million dollars a year there has now been cut in half and is steadily diminishing, the Dutch accept the situation and face the thought of poverty without grumbling.

And there is no substitute that they can turn to, for the indoor fine vegetable business has also collapsed, because England and Germany can no longer buy the crop due to currency regulations, and the added expense of transportation. When I drove from Rotterdam to the Hoek a couple of weeks ago I passed dozens and dozens of greenhouses empty of their vegetables, while outside grew patches of a kind of kale, a favorite food among Hollanders, which is only good to eat after a frost. Last night, sitting around the stove in a little country house I had a national dish called BOERE KOL, which is this kale, chopped and cooked with potatoes to make one soft green mass, and served with a great Dane of a hot dog.

The impossibility of export has hit the grape industry heavily, has brought oysters down to a quarter of their former price, and has left a comfortable surplus of butter and cheese, supplied by cows who wear burlap raincoats! As a matter of fact, Holland does not need to depend on her colonies for food -- she can raise everything she needs except wheat and fodder, which she gets from the Americas. She is now adapting herself to new conditions by planting flax for her textile mills.

The fishing business, which used to employ 16,000 men and had over 3000 boats, has been discouraged by mines. Some of the trawlers have been turned into minesweepers, and others have steered inland to the great waters of the Zuyder Zee, where, when there is no ice, they drop their nets for a new freshwater fish called a snoekbaars, a kind of pike. These dont get a chance to 'swim night over the dam' the 26-mile dike that divides the lake from the sea. A favorite tale here now is that people who skate over the Zuyder Zee see schools of fish frozen stiff in the ice, waiting for the spring to release them for the fishermen's nets, when they will be more popular, though less fragrant, than the surplus flowers of Europe's garden.

NAZI MEETING

It was my first Nazi mass-meeting. As I walked across the beaten-down snow to the doors of the Sportpalast, the vague moonlight showed up groups of men with a lot of flags standing and knocking their feet together in the cold night, and outside the doors two lines of men in black uniforms and caps with shiny visors - the noted SS men.

Inside, men in the brown uniforms of Storm troopers directed me to my place, where I looked down on rows of bald heads with a smattering of solid-looking women. The hall was packed with fifteen thousand people half an hour ahead of time. A band played and suggested to my mind the prelude to the greatest show on earth. The audience rose and held the Nazi salute when the flags were borne in solemnly and settled on the red and gold draped platform, marked by stark swastikas. A German behind me was pointing out Hess and other dignitaries on the platform to his girl.

Suddenly the band's efforts stopped, and a large band of men in uniform walked rapidly down the center aisle. The third man, and only one without a cap, was Adolf Hitler. He looked small among his stalwart bodyguard, and just like his pictures, forelock and all. He received a tremendous ovation of Heils, given loudly and rhythmically, from everyone except the foreigners in the press gallery. Dr. Goebbels introduced him in a brief speech ending with "The Führer speaks". Another round of regular cheering, and the Führer began. While he was talking, a photographer in uniform photographed him from all angles. The Führer paid no attention to anything except his notes and performance, which had variety of tempo, tone and gesture. He aroused derisive laughter more than once when talking about the English, and cheers and stamping when he described Germany's might and determination to help herself. His climax was well given with a fine crescendo and the audience was delighted with the picture of their power which he presented to them. Thenthe striding procession marched out and the audience sang their national anthems and the popular new tune about We March Against England, and some of them kept on whistling it as they went home.

This is Mary Marvin Breckinridge in Berlin.

The German High Command reports that nine armed merchant ships, four patrol vessels and one minesweeper were sunk and other ships severely damaged when German planes made an attack on English merchant ships yesterday. This is their third attack ~~on English merchant ships~~ off the English coast in a week. The attackers report that defence fire of the ships and the English pursuit planes was stronger than before. Three German ships failed to return. There is no mention of how many German ships went over, but it is probably quite a large number.

There is no other news today, and I am going to tell you about my first impressions of life in Berlin, where I have recently arrived as Columbia's travelling reporter.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS Feb. 4, 1940
Morning

Outwardly Berlin does not look warlike, except for the soldiers in the streets. Everywhere are Storm Troopers and uniformed men rattling tins of change and asking for contributions for the Winterhilfe, or winter help. Yesterday morning an SS man in black uniform with swastika on his arm crossed the street to ask me for money, and rewarded me with a little head on a pin of one of the comic characters made by the author of Max and Moritz who is very popular here now. When I had trouble pinning it on the lapel of my trenchcoat with my heavy gloves, he did it for me, and then smilingly gave me a casual Nazi salute as I went my way. At night the collectors are even more ardent. One evening I went dining and dancing in crowded restaurants and was asked nine times for contributions. ~~As the officials say that there is no unemployment in Germany, and that there is a decent minimum wage, I didn't see the need for all this help, for the campaign goes on for six months. However, several people have told me that the money goes for armaments, and perhaps also for subsidies for the export trade which are sold cheaper abroad.~~ censored

This crowding of amusement places is found everywhere in the evenings in spite of the blackout. One night I went to one of the three opera houses to hear and enjoy Traviata. One woman in our party brought a pair of shoes in a paper bag to give to the other woman. They were too small for the owner, and as shoes are almost impossible to buy, these were handed around among a group of friends until they found their Cinderella at the opera who was delighted with them. Only a handful of people were in evening dress and there was none of the kid-glove elegance that we usually expect at the opera - these were mostly sturdy working folk, dressed simply without regard to style, who seemed to prefer opera to the movies. Afterwards our party went on in one of the half dozen cars waiting outside to a popular nightspot that still keeps its French name. Swing music is forbidden, and the orchestra is allowed to play only 30% of foreign music, but they used some of their quota to play Dixie and Old Folks at Home in our honor. ~~Here we paid to draw lucky numbers from Storm troopers for the Winterhilfe, but without any luck, and at one o'clock the place was closed by police rules and we went home.~~

The restaurants and nightclubs are properly heated, and my hotel is unique in having satisfactory central heating and constant hot water, but private houses are not so lucky. I went to tea one day with a charming German lady who has an apartment in the best residential district of Berlin. She received me wearing two sweaters, a fur coat, and overshoes, her usual costume at home now. She showed me her attractive, book-lined drawing-room, where the thermometer on the wall showed a temperature of 46 degrees F. and then led me into her large bedroom where we sat around the big white porcelain stove, the only method of heating, and she proudly offered me real tea. She told me that Germany had a very strong army (her son is an officer) and plenty to eat.

I have found plenty to eat, but not much variety. A housewife took me to a big, brick market building one morning when she went to do her shopping. ~~She took with her her ration cards for meat, fats, bread, starch foods, marmelade, sugar and eggs (one a week) special foods, soap and clothes.~~ A wrinkled old woman was trying to warm her thin shoes by the stove inside the door. The butcher and his wife, in knitted caps and whitish coats on top of their overcoats, had several kinds of sausages strung in front of their booth, but little else. They had been trying to get some lamb for my housewife for three weeks without success. At the vegetable stalls were baskets of carrots and cabbages and sometimes frozen cauliflower, and rows and rows of empty boxes. One stall had a dozen cans of food on a high shelf, but they were only for decoration because it is not allowed to sell tinned food, as it is all kept for the army.

For travelers like myself there are coupons for bread, butter, margarine, lard, starch foods, and meat. As I have now been here almost a week, I can figure out how to order a meal, for each item on the menu has listed under it the number of grams of coupons required for it. A typical menu in a leading hotel has one cream soup, made of flour and water and flavoring, one fish and two meat dishes, unless it is one of the two meatless days a week; potatoes and cabbage for vegetables, and three kinds of dessert, all apple. At every meal at least one dish is exhausted, and must be replaced by sausage or apple. A friend of mine who sent me orchids in America gave me an equally nice present when I arrived here: coupons for 75 grams of butter, 35 grams of margarine, 150 grams of starch food, and 300 grams of meat!

Not only food, but also books are regulated. Yesterday I went into a leading bookshop. In the window were twenty recent books about England, and twice as many about contemporary politics and German history mixed together. Inside were half a dozen newly-prepared books about "Our War in Poland". There were also some books left from former yearsabout horses, skiing, and art. The new edition of Mein Kampf issued for the soldiers after deleting certain out-of-date passages about Russia, was there in all its 700-odd pages of fine type. I wonder how many soldiers read it all. I asked for a book in German by one of my favorite authors, and the bookstore clerk told me that his books had been forbidden for several years, for although he was not a Jew, he had said something that had made him unloved.

On the surface Berlin looks fairly normal, but actually one finds the effects of war in every part of daily life. At a friendly cocktail party to which I was invited yesterday, the girls were talking about the right color nailpolish to wear when your hands are purple with cold. The men were not in uniform yet and there was no feeling of bloodthirsty joy in the coming combat. Three of them tried to keep up their hopes by wishfully thinking that a peace would be arranged in a couple of months without launching any great offensive. Of course, they will all join up immediately when called, but without enthusiasm for this war. A German officer on the Western Front near the front sent a Christmas card to a friend of his with the illuminating saying of Tagore: "I slept and dreamt that life was Joy; I awoke and found that life was Duty".

The Four-Year Plan is being extended to include the occupied territory of Poland. The Governor-General has announced in Cracow that a Board of Control for iron and steel has been set up. This organization is authorized to give directions about procedure, distribution, storage and disposal of these goods. This will be under the German Four-Year Plan committee.

THE COLD

A report has come through this evening over DNB, the German news agency, that the Gulf of Riga is frozen over, and that it is possible that the Baltic from Latvia to Sweden may freeze too. If it does, it will be the first time in 600 years.

Berlin is completing six weeks of cold weather. It's still hard to get coal because of transportation difficulties. The canals are still frozen, and as it requires a train fifty cars long to take as much as a barge, and as there are more demands on the railways because of the war, and the brakes and parts freeze in the terrible weather, it is very difficult to move the coal where it is needed. Also, more is needed this year than before, because it has been the coldest winter in eleven years. Here in Berlin wagonloads of coal are dumped on the sidewalks and people, some of whom have never touched a piece of coal in their lives, come to collect it in baskets and household utensils. One of the American diplomats is closing his house and moving to a hotel so that he wont have to ask for special rations of coal when it is scarce. I was interested to learn that many public buildings have been closed, including most of the schools, ~~the University~~, the State Library, and the Food Administration Headquarters. Some concerts and the Lent Cantatas have been cancelled. Churches are not allowed to burn coal, so that it may be kept for more useful purposes. Today I went to the daily press conferences for foreign journalists in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Propaganda Ministry. They were very comfortably heated, as usual. Coming home in the blackout I made the mistake of walking on the west side of the Wilhelmstrasse, and was reminded by ~~soldiers~~ SS guards that it was not allowed after dark. On the west side is the Chancellerie where the Führer lives.

THE POLISH WAR

This is Mary Marvin Breckinridge in Berlin.

All of Europe is wondering when the real fighting will begin in this war, but for Berlin this is a lull between two fights. Yesterday I had a chance to see something of the last campaign, the undeclared war on Poland, and to talk to some of the German soldiers who were wounded there. They and that country were dismembered last September.

An interesting film told the story to the Press Conference of foreign journalists, consisting of about 100 men and four girls. We sat as usual in brocade-upholstered armchairs in the elegant white-and-gold ballroom of the Propaganda Ministry. The show started an hour late because the projectionist was ill and his assistant could not find the door to the projection room. Finally the rich red curtains on the stage opened to show a full-sized screen, and the film began with a German talkie synchronized to give a consecutive story to a collection of newsreels lasting about an hour. The voice and maps explained that Germany had asked Poland for Danzig and the right to construct a highway to East-Prussia across the Polish Corridor. No mention was made of a demand for the Corridor itself. Then, as Poland, encouraged by England, foolishly refused to grant these demands, the Germans marched into Danzig. As the Poles fought for the city, the German troops had to proceed into Poland. Animated diagrams showed grey units of Polish troops like amoebas inside the Polish frontier, and white strips of German troops which crossed the border into Poland, and divided and crushed the amoebas until they vanished. The pictures themselves showed German soldiers advancing on foot, motorcycle and tanks, and firing cannons (~~on apartment houses, and bombing towns from the air.~~ omitted) The most exciting sequence was taken from a plane that was flying high until it made a sudden and sickening dive on a railway station to drop its bomb and fly away. There were also scenes of soldiers cleaning guns, shaving, and eating. The only picture of Polish soldiers showed hundreds of them laying down their guns and marching off to their prison camp looking tired and depressed. In some towns, piles of rubbish, damaged streetcars and destroyed buildings were shown. There was no sign of wounded men, nor of any German losses. At Danzig, and at the end near Warsaw, Hitler came to review his troops who marched past him goose-stepping, and the film ended with a large seal showing the German eagle, the swastika, and the word "Greater Germany".

In the evening I went to see one of the results of this campaign. Over a hundred wounded soldiers have been moved into a part of a big children's orthopaedic hospital, the Oskar-Helene Heim, on the outskirts of Berlin. Most of them have lost arms or legs, and this hospital has its own workshop for making artificial limbs.

Since the World War they have further developed artificial arms whose fingers can be manipulated by moving the shoulder.

Two wholesome looking German girls, with flat hair and no makeup volunteered to visit the soldiers regularly, ~~to write letters for them, play games, read loud, and that sort of thing. This is organized under the Deutsches Frauenwerk, the large Nazi women's organization that I am going to tell you about next week. Last night these girls~~ gave a party for all the men who were able to get out of bed, and invited several officers from the War Ministry and a few local Nazi officials. I was the only Foreigner. Five long tables bordered by grey-green army uniforms and the white blouses of the visitors interspersed made it look like a real party, but crutches stood by the door, and many arms were in slings. A group of soldiers from a neighboring searchlight battery put on a burlesque performance of Shakespeare's Pyramus and Thisbe, explaining jokingly that although it was by an Englishman, it was still allowed. The audience was in gales of laughter at the lively horseplay on the stage, and the genial Colonel on my right chuckled all the way through. Afterwards we talked to two wounded privates across the table while we all drank delicious hot mulled wine and ate cakes, without having to give up bread coupons. One of them was a professional soldier who had been in the Army for four years and who wore a medal with silver braid which he had won for marksmanship. He told me he had been wounded on September 9th, so he unfortunately had to miss the fine climax of the Polish War. ~~A piece of shrapnel had pierced his lung and broken two ribs and finally was stopped by an enamel canteen on his back which he got in the Sudetenland. He lay in the field only two hours and was then taken care of in a Polish schoolhouse for two weeks before being sent here to Berlin where he was received like a prince. Another wounded man had his hand paralized, and my colonel lit his cigarette for him with his lighter and they chatted back and forth in a friendly tone. The private said that the Polish villagers were quiet at first, but as they got further into the country, Polish soldiers in civilian clothes used to fire on them from behind.~~ The soldier on my left, a 24-year-old farmer's son from western Germany with twinkly eyes, said he had seen three young Polish girls shooting a machine gun from a window on German troops, and he had seen a Polish town burned to the ground though no German soldier had been there. His opinion was that the Poles would never have resisted if they had not been pushed to it by the Jews and the English. This boy had been in Czechoslovakia too, and when I asked him what he thought of that march said vaguely that he did not know, that soldiers just did what they were told. They did not know where they were going, but he had rather enjoyed the trip, except that the barracks were full of insects, but then Poland was still dirtier!

One of the girls started playing the accordion, and everyone sang cheerful ballads - no patriotic songs and no hymns of hate. We all linked arms, and I linked mine through the artificial one of the soldier on my left and the arm of the Colonel on my right, and the long lines of men and girls rocked back and forth in time to the song.

Finally the party started to break up, and people were saying goodnight when the Nazi District leader remembered his part just in time. He jumped up, called the party to order and in a tremendous voice said that the Führer had led them well so far and would lead them on to victory, and led three well-timed Heils for Hitler, and the party was over. I shook my neighbor's only hand, and wished him good luck on his farm.

GERMAN NEWSPAPERS

German newspapers are distinctive in the world today because, although they serve a well-educated people, ~~they allow no exchange of ideas, and leave little to the reader's judgment.~~ (the censors hand out) In our Columbia broadcasts from Europe, we tell you the news and our experiences impartially and honestly and as completely as we are allowed by the censors in each country, and then leave you to draw your own conclusions. In Germany, the people are not allowed to listen to foreign broadcasts nor to read foreign papers, with a few exceptions. The only ones I can get at my hotel are a couple of Swedish and Italian papers, and all foreign papers in the German language are barred. ~~The result is that the newspapers in this country can print anything which the Government thinks is advisable without fear of contradiction.~~ There is no opposition side of the press, ~~to demand the unpleasant side of the truth.~~ I was surprised to find, for instance, that the German people have ~~never been allowed to know~~ not heard that the British ship Ark Royal was not sunk last Autumn, nor had they any definite information about any German submarines being sunk.

Just now the papers are full of the executions of the two Irishmen who bombed innocent citizens. The papers here say that these men died for the freedom of Ireland but ~~neglected to say that most of~~ Ireland has been independent for several years and ~~that~~ its independence has been recognized by Germany who now has a Legation there. ~~When I called at that Legation in November, I was told by an official that England had not put any pressure on Ireland to enter the war and that the country is still neutral. Yet here the papers say that Ireland is in slavery.~~

This ~~complete~~ press control simplifies the task of preserving a unified attitude of the people toward the war, since they hear only one side of every question. The most intelligent paper in Germany is probably the Frankfurter Zeitung, whose articles show more careful thought than some of the others. Its language is more complicated, in the old style, and it is therefore less popular than the simpler modern papers.

In Berlin all but one of the papers are tabloid in size, and thinner than before. The advertisements are small, and most of them are for movies and other entertainments. No German papers have any society columns or funnies, but they all have political caricatures, usually of Winston Churchill or Chamberlain. The target for articles, photographs and cartoons is still England rather than France.

The most-read paper in Germany is the official Völkischer Beobachter, which styles itself "The fighting paper of the National Socialist Movement of Greater Germany". Almost every day it runs a three-column article against England at the top of the front page, with biggest-sized headlines underlined in red. Today France shares with England the whole top of the front page concerning the execution of the Alsacian autonomist. At the bottom of the first page there is a small story from New York about a demonstration in Philadelphia for the IRA men. Four short dispatches from Amsterdam about shipping disasters and one item giving the usual High Command notice of "No news to report", complete the front page. On the other seven large pages are more foreign news, a serial story entitled "The Worker", a whole page of movie and theatre ads and half a page of their reviews; half a page of war pictures; and a page each of financial news in Germany and of death notices and Help wanted, listed side by side, and prominently boxed. There is only one real advertisement, and that is a half-page ad for cigarettes. The German papers never carried many ads even before the war. ~~This paper is supported by a prosperous publishing firm which does a lot of official business, and in which Hitler and other government leaders have large interests.~~ The motto of this important official paper is Freedom and Bread. There is still bread. We return you now to Columbia, New York.

From Berlin

INTERVIEW

Hill Good evening, Marvin, I see you managed to get out here to the studio all right, although as a newcomer to Germany you must find the blackout confusing.

Breck Well, after all, Russ, I've been here almost two weeks and I'm beginning to get used to it.

Hill I always find the hardest part of getting here is finding my way from the subway through the great piles of snow on the Adolf Hitler Platz to the radio station.

Breck The eerie part to me is coming down across the lot under dim blue lights to this little studio and having the SS men pop out of the shadows with tin signs like decanter labels around their necks, asking to see my permit and lighting the steps for me with their flashlights. But now that we're here, have you got some news?

Hill Today has been pretty quiet like most days recently. I've been trying to find out what the Wilhelmstrasse has to say to Secretary Welles' projected visit to Berlin.

Breck Did you find out anything?

Hill Just a couple of hours ago I got a statement saying that no opinion is going to be given.

Breck That does n't sound like very much.

Hill No, I guess it is't. But it took a long time even to get that official statement, because all such matters must be thoroughly discussed by the government leaders, and that often includes Hitler himself, before any news can be released. As you saw, the newspapers have not carried a word about the matter. Evidently, the Wilhelmstrasse wants to find out whether Secretary Welles' visit should be treated as a peace effort before saying anything about it. Even if it is regarded in that way, we must remember that the Nazis have been saying they will only make peace if it is a German peace. I dont know whether that is the kind of peace our Government would be interested in helping to negotiate. But I'd like to hear about some of the impressions you have picked up since coming to Germany. I know you have been meeting lots of Germans lately, and I suppose they may have changed some of your ideas about Germany?

Breck That's true about some things. For example, I find that Germany seems to have more moral staying-power than I thought. Of course, no one can tell how large the reserves of food and oil are, but at the moment very little is allowed to be used. However, the people here dont seem to resent the numerous restrictions as much as Americans would.

Hill I'm sure the Germans dont exactly like these restrictions either. You have probably noticed that too.

Breck On the whole I think they take them as a natural consequence ~~affliction like growing pains and accept them with resignation.~~ On Tuesday, for instance, a waiter in one of the best old restaurants in Berlin apologized to me with a charming smile because he had no meat, no fish, no green vegetable, no dessert, no fruit. and of course no eggs, tea, coffee or chocolate. My Nazi friend and I laughed with him - and left a bit hungry.

Hill Yes, naturally they would and undoubtedly many believe it will be a short war because they hope so. Only yesterday I spoke with a German woman who said the war cannot last longer than six months, but she couldn't or wouldn't tell me how she expected it to end so soon. Maybe she was thinking of Hitler's New Year's message in which he said that 1940 would be the decisive year of the War.

Breck Perhaps that is why everyone here expects Germany to start a big offensive in the spring. They dont know whether it will be a tremendous air attack against England or a big land offensive. No one expects the army to tackle the Maginot line for that would cost too many men.

Hill Have you found many people who think that, if there is a great air attack, the Germans would try to bomb London?

Breck No, I believe they think that would be unwise because they would meet united and strong resistance and partly also because such an attack would sway american opinion unfavorably, and they dont want to risk any action on our part.

Hill Yes, I imagine the air attack, if it comes, may not be an attack on large cities at all.

Breck I have heard it suggested that they might rush for several ports and harbors all at once, thereby dividing the Air Force defences. They would try to cripple England by destroying her vital life lines to the outside world. That would be a more drastic continuation of the present policy of sinking all shipping that is bound for England.

Hill Do you get the impression, Marvin, that people in Berlin really hate the English?

Breck No, the only bitterness I have noticed against England is in the press and in the popular new song against England.

*Hill The food situation may be a little hard at times but dont you think the Germans cheer themselves with the thought that the war will soon be over?

Hill It's interesting that you who have been in Berlin only two weeks and I who have been here all through the war should reach the same conclusions about German public opinion.

Breck Yes, but I think it is time for us to stop talking about it!

Hill All right---------We return you now to Columbia, New York.

THE AMERICAN EMBASSY

Our American Embassy in Berlin is in a unique position at the moment, due to the changing map of Europe and to the war. In less than three years the size of Germany has greatly increased. This means that part of the work which was done by our Legations in Austria and Czechoslovakia and our Embassy in Poland is now done or directed by the Berlin Embassy. In addition, the present war has brought to the Embassy the task of handling British and French interests, and looking after their war prisoners. All this is managed from the fine new building, formerly the Blücher Palace, into which the diplomatic and consular services moved almost a year ago. It is centrally located beside the famous Brandenburg Tor, near the Wilhelmstrasse, and within a couple of hundred yards of the Chancellerie where Hitler lives, Goebbels' new house, and the lemon yellow house which Ribbentrop is doing over.

The old palace is now beautifully adapted to its present job. In addition to the wide halls with red carpet which one rather expects of an Embassy, it has well-equipped and attractive offices. A few more changes have been made recently, like making a skating rink out of the tennis court, and adding bathrooms for the women employees so they can get hot baths which they cant get at home. A couple of days ago they opened a commissary near the massive front door. The neat new shelves lined with American canned food and fresh supplies brought mainly from Denmark and Holland were shown to me with some pride by the officer in charge, who has become in a sense the butter-and-egg man of the Embassy. He has handled a similar store in the Moscow Embassy, the only other one that needs such facilities just now. It serves only American Foreign Service officials, of course. The Embassy is trying to become as self-sufficient as a ship at sea, so they have their own repairmen, and have just bought a car and trailer to cope with the transportation problem.

Under the same administration department come all questions of practical workings, like special couriers, the diplomatic pouch, care of buildings, etc. and now the new job of issuing ration cards, which means sorting and stamping two or three thousand pieces of paper each month. These are for the staff which consists of 160 persons, about a hundred of whom are American citizens. The most unusual thing about the personnel, however, is that it is an Embassy without an Ambassador, for we have not had one here for almost a year and a half.

The present chief is an exceptionally able man and universally respected, and he is always accessible to the Americans who need to see him. To save transit time and coal, he has moved into a pipe-lined porters room in the basement of the Embassy and lives there much of the time. He sets an example for hard work which is followed by all of his staff, both officers and clerks.

Toward the bottom of these classifications we come ~~at~~ to staff members with unusual qualifications such as a receptionist who is a professional guitar player, and a night watchman who is also an American dentist.

Embassy life is not all parties, as some people seem to think. There has not been an official dinner since the war began, and the officers work until about seven every night. One of them always sleeps there in turn. Another popular illusion is shattered when you learn that only a handful of officers are directly concerned with international politics, but all are charged with obligations contributing to that work.

The biggest section is the Consular. Naturally there are not many of our citizens in Germany now, but they have all had to have their passports validated under the new Neutrality Act, and two of the officers have dirty thumbs as a result of all the thumbprinting. This should have been done by the end of December, but in January the German police sent in about a hundred tardy Americans for validation. Few American businesses are left. They were diminishing even before the war. Many Americans, many of them naturalized Germans, want to return to the States, but the difficulty is the currency problem. Even though they have plenty of German marks, they are not allowed to change them into foreign currency, and they cannot buy steamship tickets with Marks. The Consulate sends cables to friends in the UnitedStates to get money, and it helps all Americans to leave Germany, as it did the four blonde roller-skaters who were caught here at the beginning of the war. The only Americans whom we allow to travel here now are those that come for philanthropic, journalistic or very special business reasons.

The Visa section of the Consulate is always busy. The quota of Germans allowed into our country each year is 27,000. At the moment there are 248,000 names registered of people who want to go to the United States, but a few of these have gone to neutral countries already. Ninety-eight percent of the total list are Jewish, and as less than half a million Jews are left in Germany, that means that about half want to come to the United States. Of course, a lot of people who are registered would never pass our severe examinations, which are not only physical, but also financial and political. Under the Consulate also come the protection and welfare of our citizens in Germany and the liquidation of American interests such as property taken away at the border, and that sort of thing.

In the Chancery, the workshop of the Embassy, there are five sections. The Economic Section continues its work much as before the war, and sends back reports on finance and trade. The Press Section is mainly concerned with studying the German press and reporting on it to Washington, and it also is available to help the twenty American journalists in Berlin. The Polish Section has charge of questions pertaining to German Poland, where American Poles may need assistance, or want to find their relatives.

The interest of the Allied prisoners of war is taken care of by a special section. There are several hundred of them, relatively few for a major war, and more French than English. It was explained to me that the English seem to drown promptly instead of being taken prisoner. They are stationed in two groups of camps, one in southern and one in western Germany.

The last, and one of the most interesting sections, relates to our handling of the interests of French and British nationals, all except the South Africans who have put their interests into the hands of Sweden. One part deals with government properties from the two Embassies nearby, and the cultural institutes in Berlin, through all the consulates throughout Greater Germany, and the residences of all their foreign service officials. At the beginning of the war, a tall, dignified American diplomat went around personally with his pocket full of thumbtacks and posted on each door a notice in English and German, with a large red seal, saying that it was under the protection of the UnitedStates of America. Then they set about the task, practically completed now, of ending leases, paying bills, storing furniture, and otherwise winding up the affairs of both governments. They are now trying to arrange a reciprocal exchange of property between German and English officials.

This section also takes care of British and French Nationals who are not diplomats, finds where they are, gives them messages from home, and provides relief where needed, though it is complicated by the difficulties of money exchange. There are a couple of thousand each of British and French here, and only about a hundred of each are interned. There are a few British women interned, but no French. Our Embassy has already arranged some exchanges with England, and is working on exchanges with the French. A number of British women and children have been allowed to leave Germany without exchanges.

An unusual case is that of several hundred lascars, Indian seamen who worked on German boats. About half of them are interned in their own camp with their own food; the other half have been released by getting them jobs on neutral ships bound for the East.

The work in this department is carried on in English, German and French, and translations are only used in connection with reports to the State Department.

The Military and Naval Attachés have their offices in our Embassy, and have work of more than usual interest during a war. The Navy Department transmits a daily Radio bulletin from the State Department to keep the officers in touch with important affairs at home. It is received directly in Berlin, Paris, Rome and London, and then mimeographed and mailed to all the consulates in Europe. This contains nothing confidential, and is sent in straight English.

Any code messages, which number about forty to fifty a day, go through the Code Room, which is guarded like a bank vault and plastered with No admittance signs. I barely got a look through the peephole when I went to send a cable; for they send important cables for Americans as we are not allowed to telegraph to foreign countries without very special permission. Six people work in the Code Room, some of them even on Sunday, and the Chief Clerk lives there so he is always on call.

Although it keeps in touch with America, it prefers to work quietly and not blow its own horn, so I am glad to have this chance to tell you about it in the first broadcast on the subject.

We return you now to Columbia, New York.

THE BRIDES' SCHOOL

Twenty-five brides, nine of them already married and the rest engaged, are taking a six weeks' course at the Brides' School which I visited this week. There are eight other similar schools in Germany, all started by the National Socialist Party since 1934. They have a double purpose: to make the girls into useful wives and mothers, and good Nazis.

The school I went to is in an attractive private house on a hill overlooking Wannsee, a lake near Berlin, where the girls now ski over the snow-covered ice. ~~Both it and the house across the street where Propaganda Minister Goebbels' family lives, used to belong to Jews.~~

The Director. a tall, thin, alert young woman in a practical plaid dress, led me into the reception room of the attractive country house which was hung with photographic portraits of the Party leaders ~~and furnished in larch wood of simple design. One of the brides, a smiling round faced girl who had been a Post Office employee in Thuringia, brought in some hot currant syrup. She told me she was very lucky to be admitted to the course so quickly because she was only enrolled for six months. She is engaged to an SS man, and~~ The course is obligatory for the wives of SS men, as it's designed to produce the perfect German woman: useful wife and mother and good Nazi. The girls who are mostly between 19 and 21 don't have to be members of the Nazi party but they must be of pure German stock and have letters of recommendation from their local Nazi headquarters showing that they come of good, well-disposed families. The Director told me with pride what a wonderful change these few weeks make on the girls' political outlook, for they learn to see things with new eyes from the Nazi point of view, and are usually keen to join the Party at the end.

Every morning at seven thirty they all go outdoors and stand in a circle with arms raised in the Nazi salute to the German flag, and sing a song, and then the Director reads a quotation, usually from Hitler, or from Frau Scholz-Klink, who is the Women's führer, ~~or sometimes from some old writer who is still timely. The flag is taken down again in the evening with the same ceremony. After breakfast of malt coffee, butter and marmelade, they sing folksongs and children's songs for half an hour before starting~~ After breakfast they work on housecleaning, cooking and sewing where cleanliness and orderliness are stressed. In the sunny sewing-room one chatty bride-to-be told me that since dresses were hard to get she was learning to make over an old dress of her sister's who was much fatter than she was. Another, a tall, thin girl with pale face and hair, proudly told me she was being married this coming Saturday to a soldier who had two weeks leave from the West Front. Then she would go back to her previous job of teaching fifty children ~~between the ages of six and ten,~~ for the Reich is short of teachers now.

In the pantry two tables were covered with neat rows of plates piled high with fancy cookies, the product of the baking class. Each plateful was to be sent to a fiancé at the front, in the SS Corps or the Storm Troops. The kitchen girls were working in wash dresses and aprons for none of these Mädchen are in uniform. They carried the great tureens of thick soup, dumplings (for this was a meatless day) and apple sauce into the dining room where the brides sat in ~~orange-covered chairs around spotless white oilcloth covered tables. There was~~ perfect silence during lunch for they were all listening to the radio news which is part of the course. It came only from a local station, naturally, for no German is allowed to listen to foreign stations. I tiptoed out to see the efficient laundry and the three rooms of a sample bride's apartment. The government gives a marriage loan of 1000 marks to suitable couples, and these rooms were designed to show how you could furnish a newly-wed's apartment simply but practically on 1500 Marks. Above them are rooms for the four teachers of cooking, sewing, gymnastics and housecleaning, and handidrafts and health. Among other courses taught in class are Child Care, First Aid, Household Questions, Mending, and Teaching Children, including political theory. The brides do all the work so they have no servants except the gardener who keeps the house filled with flowers in season.

The girls pay 135 Marks each for the course, and some get scholarships if they need them. The rest of the running-expenses are paid by the Deutsches Frauenwerk, the big Nazi women's Organization.

Since the girls are purposely chosen from different parts of Germany and don't know Berlin, they are taken on a free Sunday to visit Potsdam Castle and Church, or into town to see the new Government buildings. Last weekend they went to the theatre to see Saint Joan by Bernard Shaw, which they thought excellent.

The Director told me that ~~since the purpose of the course is to make the brides into good German mothers interested in politics as well as in their usual birth and death notices~~ she conducts a special course after supper in how to read the newspapers (~~only German, of course~~). ~~She discusses the news with the girls~~ and tries to instil in them a certain viewpoint which, she said, they really get all day long. Then the brides sing an evening song, fill their hot water bottles and climb up to their dormitories. Each room has four neat white iron beds and beside each one is the photograph of the fiancé in helmet, cap with visor, or overseas cap. I saw only two books in the dormitories, both in German naturally. One was called "The Belief in the Nordic State", and the other was called simply "Men". And when they complete their course in the Brides School and are married, the Reich will give them the same wedding present as to all German brides: instead of a Bible as it used to be, it is now a copy of Hitler's "Mein Kampf".

I return you now to Columbia, New York.

Breckinridge CSB SHOPPING #20 Feb. 17,1940
Morning

From Berlin

Day before yesterday afternoon I decided to do some shopping. Transient foreigners dont get clothing cards, so I knew I could not buy any clothes without a special permit secured through the American Consulate or, as I'm a journalist,through the Propaganda Ministry. I didn't realize at first how far-reaching the clothing-control was until I lunched recently with an American banker. He was very pleased because he had just bought a six-year old overcoat from a diplomat. Now all he had to do was to get a permit from the Consulate to buy some material to patch the lining, and a permit to buy some thread, and then a tailor could make it whole again.

Shoes are not listed on any clothing cards, so everyone has to get a permit to buy a pair and show that it's necessary. The only shoes that dont need permits are old models costing forty Marks or more, but the keeper of a dignified old shoe shop told me yesterday that there weren't any of these left. He said he had enough of the finest leather from France and England to last for ten years. It has not yet been taken over by the Government like the stock of luxury leather for purse-making that belonged to the cousin of one of my friends. Although his civilian business is practically dead, this shoemaker is kept busy making boots for officers, who get their permits from the Army. No soldier gets clothing cards, so they cant supplement their outfits for extra comfort without convincing the right officer of their need.

Shop windows in Berlin are full of merchandise, but the keepers are forbidden to sell things out of the window. A friend of mine tried to buy some wine that she saw in the window, but found it couldn't be sold because it spoiled the decoration. Some of the store shelves are still lined with tinned food, but that cant be sold because it has all been requisitioned by the Government. And even if the shops are losing money and cant pay the rent, they are not allowed to close. A drugstore here was evidently bothered by too many questions for it put a sign on the door "Paper Handkerchiefs Sold Out".

Some articles are reserved for export, like the best cameras. In the biggest photographic shop in the city, I could not buy accessories for my Rolleiflex camera. The salesman said he had not received a single Contax or Leica camera to sell since Christmas, for though they are still being made, they are all kept for export, to help the foreign exchange situation.

In an attractive specialty shop, I saw a paisley wool scarf and asked how much it was. The salesgirl answered "Eight Marks and five points". She meant five points out of the hundred on a German person's clothing card. When you see a large sign on a counter saying "Free", it doesn't mean that the store will give you the things for nothing, but only that they dont require points. In this category I saw some bathing suits, including a bright yellow one with large red polka dots, and some silk handkerchiefs. Real silk is "free", if you can find it. There is still taffeta and chiffon in some of the better shops, but it's quite unsuited to the climate and people almost never wear evening dress now. By the same token, men can now buy without using their points, morning coats, dress suits, and dinner jackets. If this war goes on much longer we may find all of Berlin going formal and office boys wearing morning coats and truck drivers dinner jackets! Already I noticed yesterday a man who looked like a respectable butcher shopping in a silk hat.

The idea in Germany now is to discourage buying so as to conserve the present supply and prevent hoarding, and the quality of goods and the atmosphere of the big stores help to promote the idea.

The AWAG, which used to be Wertheim's, is about the biggest department store here. The furniture department was practically empty of buyers. In the commercial stationery, there was a fine display of holders for rubber stamps, which is indicative of the needs of the times. Nearby was a counter piled high with cardboard boxes about the size of a book for sending presents to the men at the Front. In this big store the only pencils I could get with erasers on them were fancy little bridge pencils. I guess they are keeping their rubber for other purposes than correcting mistakes.

On my way home it was getting dark and snowing hard. Near my hotel I could distinguish about twenty persons in line outside the door of a smart candy shop, which always has pretty lavender boxes in the windows, though it has no chocolate to sell. The shop was full, and these people were waiting patiently for their turn to squeeze in and buy something. I asked a middle-aged woman what she wanted, and she answered with a beaming smile that one could buy a quarter of a pound of pralines there, just that afternoon, and she advised me to get in line so I wouldn't miss the treat. If she got in before the supply gave out, she'd be lucky and would consider her shopping trip a great success.

I return you now to Columbia, New York.

FUNERAL AND INTERVIEW WITH CAPTAIN DAU OF ALTMARK

Good evening, this is Mary Marvin Breckinridge speaking from Stavanger, Norway. I came here to attend the funeral of six German sailors who died as a result of the English attack on their ship, the Altmark, on Friday night.

The funeral was held this afternoon in a little country burying-ground a few miles from Jössingfjord, where the ship is. It was attended by a couple of hundred persons, including German and Norwegian officials, the officers and a detachment of sailors from the Altmark, half a dozen foreign journalists who flew up with me from Berlin, and all the farmers' families from miles around. The funeral was more ominous than sad. The Germans held the Nazi salute as each white and gold coffin covered with the German flag was lowered into the frozen ground. A chorus of sailors sang a song, and the Evangelical minister in long black robe and white stock read the service and threw a spadeful of earth on each coffin. Then the German Minister to Norway, Mr. Brauer, in diplomatic uniform, made an address, half of it directed to Norway, the other half about his deceased fellow-countrymen. Captain Dau of the Altmark, a tall man with a white goatee who has been at sea for fortyfive years, spoke briefly. Finally a Commodore representing the Norwegian Navy spoke, and then removing his pince-nez, he dropped a wreath into each of the six graves, and saluted each one. Before he had finished the German Minister was adding another wreath from the German Navy to the two dozen or so of artificial flowers which were piled on the upturned earth. The service was over, and the people who had been stamping their half-frozen feet, crossed the field through snow almost knee-deep to return to the road. The open farm trucks which had brought the coffins were filled with country children and their skis; the officials found their cars, the sailors piled into their busses, and all went home as the winter sun was setting. There was no mention at the funeral of the names or ranks of any of the men who were buried in Norway, across the icy sea from their Fatherland.

Tonight the Captain of the Altmark, formerly Captain of the Deutschland, is here with me in our little studio, and I'll ask him some of the questions you and I would like to know.

Breck: Captain Dau, we would like to hear your story of what occurred on Friday - so let's begin at the beginning. Where were you bound for when you unexpectedly ~~got~~ put in at Jössingfjord?
Dau: I was bound for Germany in completion of my voyage.
Breck: How many interned British seamen did you have on board?
Dau: There were 303 in all.
Breck: Were they all from ships sunk by the Graf Spee?
Dau: Yes, all of them without exception. There were 228 Britishers, 8 negroes and 67 lascars.

Breck: Were they all from merchant ships or did some of them belong to the Navy?

Dau: They were all from merchant ships, without exception.

Breck: When did you realize you were being pursued?

Dau: Even when three English planes flew over us we did not feel pursued at all, because we felt perfectly safe in neutral territorial waters, only about three quarters of a mile from the coast.

Breck: Did the English Captain send you any message or signal?

Dau: One of the English ships asked me to alter my course to the west.

Breck: Were there any guns on the Altmark?

Dau: No. we had no guns aboard the Altmark.

Breck: How were the men killed whose funeral I've just attended?

Dau: They were shot from the rifles and pistols of the British, boarding-party as well as from the destroyer itself. Some of them were killed where they stood on the deck of the Altmark, some while they tried to escape over the ice or swimming in the water. One of them was so badly wounded when he had already reached the shore. He was hit while on Norwegian soil.

Breck: I hear one Englishman was found drowned the next day?

Dau: No, that is not the case. I have only heard that one of the boarding-party fell overboard when he tried to climb over the rail. I would like to mention that I had given strict orders to my crew to offer no resistance. None of my men fired a single shot. I was determined to respect Norwegian neutrality at all costs.

Breck: What did the English do after the shooting was over?

Dau: They took the English seamen aboard the destroyer and left the Altmark hurriedly. They appeared to be in a very nervou state all the time. The internees, however, took the time and opportunity, before leaving my ship. to express their thanks for the treatment they received. I may mention that they had the same rations that my own men had and the same medical attention. The internees quarters had been fitted up as well as possible under the circumstances. we laid out carpets, that had been taken from one of the captured ships for the purpose.

Breck: Did you talk to any of the English officers?

Dau: No, I did not.

Breck: How long were they on board?

Dau: For about an hour and a half in all.

Breck: What did the Norwegians do during this time?

Dau: They stood back and did nothing as far as I could see.

Breck: Thank you so much, Captain Dau. It's been very interesting to hear your first-hand account of this extraordinary adventure.

I return you now to Columbia, New York.

Breckinridge CBS THE ALTMARK Number 22
Feb. 21, 1940
From Norway

Good evening, this is Mary Marvin Breckinridge in Stavanger, Norway. I've just been visiting the Altmark in Jessingfjord, eighty miles from here and I'd hoped to tell you last night what I saw, but I was caught on a mountain road by a terrible blizzard and had to stay overnight in a farmhouse, ~~and came on today, when it took us twelve hours to cover thirty miles.~~

Jessingfjord is a beautiful little inlet on the southwest coast of Norway. I flew the length of it in a German plane coming up from Berlin, and we dove way below the tops of the steep rocky mountains that encircle it. A Norwegian gunboat is still anchored there, and a torpedo boat was nearby.

The Altmark is grounded, stern first, about two thirds of the way up the fjord. This was done by the Captain's order, as he told me, to prevent the ship's being removed by the men of the British destroyer Cossack when they boarded it last Friday night and rescued the 303 interned fellow-countrymen.

The postmistress of the hamlet whom I saw yesterday, is the local heroine, now, for when the British began firing in the middle of the night, all the villagers fled up the cliffs while she stayed behind and received into her warm house the German sailors who fled over the ice. Fresh snow has since covered the ice, so I could not see any tracks, but there was a red patch on the shore where I was told a man was hit while climbing on land.

~~The First Officer received me as I climbed up the steep gangplank from the snow-covered shore~~ On board. I had a long talk with the ~~Dr. Tyrolt~~ and ~~with Mr. Weichert,~~ the Fourth Officer, who was put in charge of the prisoners because of his good command of English, and they showed me all over the captives quarters which they said had been left untouched.

The Altmark is a combination freighter and tanker of 11000 gross registered tonnage, carrying a crew of about 125. It was built only the year before last by the Howaldt-Werke at Kiel and used by the Graf Spee as a supply ship. The internees, who came from six merchant vessels sunk by the Graf Spee, filled the space left vacant by supplies delivered to the pocket battleship.

I climbed down on an iron ladder from the main deck, the sixth from the bottom, to the third, which was the lowest one used, where the smoking room was. The holds had no portholes but had some artificial ventilation, and there were pipes along the iron walls for heating, electric lights, and a mirror in each hold, where about sixty men lived. The iron floors were covered with thick rugs, taken from the ships that were to be sunk, and the men slept on them wrapped in blankets close together. ~~In one hold a special division was made for eight negroes, and the single mulatto slept in a hammock there.~~ The 67 Indians had a room and sick bay to themselves.

Each hold was about ten yards square and had either tubs of washing water or a special washing room available. The officers hold had twotables where about ten of their books were scattered, and one of the men's rooms had a table and two benches, otherwise there was no furniture. Homemade checkerboards were left about, and I also saw several pounds of real butter from Germany, three loaves of bread, odd bits of clothes and shipmade sandals. The pink-cheeked, brown-eyed young Fourth Officer told me that the British seamen got exactly the same rations as the German crew, except for a little less sugar, ~~all cooked in the same pots in the only kitchen,~~ and the got the same amount of water and cigarettes when they had to be rationed too. ~~They also got the same special little cakes for Christmas. He himself visited them twice a day, the doctor once a day, and the Captain every two weeks.~~ The nice Tyrolian doctor told me that British and German were treated alike in his hospital, and showed me a wooden shipmodel named Altmark on the medicine cabinet which a British seaman had made for him. The two captured captains had the two-berth outside cabin of the Fourth Engineer, and instead of the three quarters of an hour on deck each day like the men, they were allowed the run of the ship, except at night.

On the port side of the after deck, I saw a couple of dozen bullet holes big enough to put my little finger through. The Germans said that they were 11 MM. bullets from repeating pistols, and showed me the lead still left in some of the iron supports. The doctor ~~said these are like dumdum bullets, and make a spreading wound, much bigger inside than at the entrance. He~~ dressed ~~such~~ a wound in the arm of a British officer who was carried to his cabin after being hit by one of his own men, for the Altmark men had no arms. The Fourth Officer said he was shot at though not hit when he returned from the hospital with bandages for the wounded Englishmen. All the German officers said the British seemed very jumpy and nervous, "kolossal nervos", as the Captain expressed it, and they thought that might account for the wild and pointless shooting.

Under the gangway along the middle deck I saw a line of frozen blood and a lump of flesh which fell through the slats into the snow where a German sailor was fatally shot. A little later the doctor was walking there when a searchlight from the Cossack, then alongside, caught him, and a bullet whizzed by his ear. He could hear some of the rescued Englishmen now on board the Cossack shout "Don't shoot, that's the German doctor". The firing stopped immediately, and he told me he leaned against the rail with folded arms until the searchlight was finally turned away.

Many of the captives said goodbye to him warmly, and the Indians said "Salaam, Sahib". Many shook hands with Captain Dau and with Mr. Weichert, and one of them gave him some cigarettes which he'd got from a Cossack man, as they thanked him for decent treatment, and said they'd see that they were well treated too when they were interned in England, but afterwards the raiding party gave up the idea of taking the Germans back with them. These officer were surprised to find that the British had taken many things with them, including the Fourth Officer's uniform jacket from his cabin. He apologized to me, the only woman to come on board the Altmark in seven months, for appearing in a sweater when we had coffee in the Captain's cabin yesterday. The Captain said they had taken a silver inkwell from there, and his fountain pen, and his best blue suit. Another officer told me they had taken his most cherished possession, a photograph album full of pictures of his children growing up.

I gathered from the officers, and the few men that I had a chance to speak with, that they were amazed at the attack in neutral waters, they were shocked and resentful at the shooting which was entirely unnecessary, and hurt that the English sailors should stoop to pilfer their little private possessions. Of course, they are deeply disappointed at the catastrophe so near the end of their hitherto successful trip, and more dismayed than angry.

So there lies the Altmark, grounded in a lonely little Norwegian fjord, its rudder and screw broken, some of its men dead, the others confined to their ship, its captives gone, its future uncertain, and the ultimate effects of its adventure still unknown.

Breckinridge CBS PRISON CAMP Number 23
Feb. 25, 1940
From Berlin

Recently there was a story in the offical paper that Churchill had sent notices to the wives of four of the men from the submarines Undine and Starfish to say that their husbands died in action. The wives were annoyed but not sad, according to the account, because they had already received reassuring letters from their husbands who are now prisoners of war in Germany.

I talked to some of these prisoners of war when I visited their camp IX A recently, where 120 Englishmen and 55 Frenchmen are imprisoned.

It's misleading to call the place a 'camp', because the enlisted men live in a kind of stone dormitory building, carefully guarded of course, in a picturesque village in the middle of Germany. Tall, yellow, half-timbered houses border a steep street where children were coasting on the icy roadway. At the top of the cone-shaped hill is the 700-year old castle where the officers live, complete with drawbridge, turrets, little courtyard and fine view. It was modernised and used as a forestry school before the war, so it had central heating, which was a good thing ~~since the temperature outside was five below zero Fahrenheit~~.

As we crossed the dry moat, guarded by only three sentries, the German officer who escorted me leaned over the railing and began calling 'Gustav! Gustav!' A sentry took up the cry, but Gustav, who turned out to be a pet boar, although he lived in the moat and couldn't get out, still kept his independence and refused to come out to meet me. The Allied officers inside were just as independent in manner, but much more pleased to have a visitor, for they had seen no one but a Red Cross worker and the representative of the American Embassy who has charge of Allied prisoners of war, until the day I arrived. I talked to many of them freely, except that I was asked not to give them any recent war news. They asked me, for instance, if the English had really lost so many merchant ships lately. as they were told, but I didn't know the real answer anyway because I'd already been in Germany a couple of weeks and had seen only German newspapers. I sat on the table in the center of a dormitory with eight beds, and the British officers gathered around to chat. Many wore Czech uniforms which were given them by the Germans when they were fished out of the water, and had bushy beards, and eight or ten had shaved heads, in the German style. I asked one of them quietly if it was a punishment, and he roared with laughter and said no, they'd just got bored a couple of days before because they have absolutely nothing to do, so they shaved their heads for a pastime. ~~And they pointed out a young Canadian who had shaved his a long time ago and now his hair has grown in thick and curly~~. I must say that luscious beards and shaved skulls look funny on the same head!

One of these men was a pilot who had dropped leaflets one day at the door of the Captain's house, whose little son brought them in; soon afterwards, German soldiers brought the pilot in as a captive to the captain's camp! A fair, young South African pilot told me he was brought down by an anti-aircraft gun over Sylt. The plane fell to bits at 3000 feet, and he landed by parachute, but the other three men were killed. ~~Another prisoner is the son of an old friend of the German captain from Shanghai days.~~ They all cracked jokes and kidded each other, and included my smiling German officer in the general conversation from time to time. This Captain, who was the Adjutant of the General in charge of the camp, speaks English and French fluently, and was himself a prisoner of war in England for two years last time, captured while returning from Africa in a little sailing boat. ~~A welfare worker told me that prison camps on both sides are now being run by former prisoners of war and as a result the treatment is definitely better. Because of its situation and moat it requires only three men at a time and very little barbed wire to guard Camp IX A. The sentries are all veterans, and some were prisoners in Siberia. None of them stay in the Castle, and only two officers are there in the daytime and I think one at night.~~ My captain, who knew most of his prisoners personally, their names, homes, ranks, and adventures, showed me their registration cards in his office, each with a photograph taken immediately after his capture. The expressions were of men who had been through a terrific ordeal and were apprehensive. The Captain said he didn't understand why the British officers had seemed so terribly nervous and jittery at first, and I replied that it must be because England had heard so much about the concentration camps of Dachau and Buchenwald (~~and didn't realize that the Army was different.~~) In the early days the men wanted detective stories and thrillers to take their minds off their own adventures; now they are calm again and looking forward, and asked for books about love, advanced photography and electrical and mechanical engineering, in the order named. Their favorite games are bridge and monopoly.

The complete crews of the Undine and Starfish are there. The Starfish men told me that they were down on the bottom for nine hours and received 32 depth charges before they had to give up. Then they were able to get only the stern of the submarine up, and they all crawled out an emergency exit. One of these ratings wrote a typical letter home to his father:"Dont worry about me, we are treated very good. We get cigarettes every day and the food is alright".

I was shown around the castle where the officers can roam about freely. In the little Reading Room there was a rowing machine and an accordion, and on the door were carved the names of Frenchmen who had been prisoners of war there in 1871, and of Germans from other states who had been here before. In a big room nearby two Frenchmen were playing pingpong. On the whole, the French seemed more depressed than the British. Wisely the management has made the Frenchmen do the cooking, and in the kitchen I tasted the cutlet, turnips and potatoes that were ready to be served for lunch. Later I had lunch at the inn where the German officers eat. The food was practically the same, but not so good. While I was in the kitchen, an English prisoner came in with a lump of macaroni in tomato sauce which he'd got in a tin from home, to have it heated by the special cook who's assigned to cook individual dishes.

Looking through the window, I saw a yellow cart from the Post Office piled high with bundles mostly from the Red Cross pushed into the courtyard by four prisoners, followed by two guards. Later I saw them distributed unopened by an English sergeant to each individual. One man showed me with glee a hand-knitted glove he'd received. Its hand extended from my fingertips to my elbow! My Captain and the Commandant stood aside dignified but amiable as the captured officers, including two from the Rawalpindi, opened packages containing not only towels, underwear and socks, but also tinned food, soap, chocolate, and coffee, all now unobtainable in Germany. The only people I've seen with these things here are prisoners of war and diplomats. Later these same officers, who never take anything from the prisoners, accepted with unusual pleasure half a piece of chocolate and a few teaspoonfuls of coffee that I happened to have with me.

Two things are especially noteworthy about this camp. In the first place, the Germans are here observing an international agreement, and conduct the camp according to the Geneva Convention of 1929. In the second place, there is here a unique spirit of tolerance and respect for the other fellow's standards. It was shown when I attended a communion service, the first one held at the camp, and sat on the backless benches of the common room with all the British prisoners who wanted to come. (The French, being Catholics, had separate services held by their own two captured priests). Paper decorations hung about, left over from New Year Eve, and a half-finished puzzle was pushed into a corner. The Anglican service was read by the only Episcopalian clergyman in Germany. He was asked not to discuss political subjects in his sermon and he wondered if he should include the usual prayer for the King. So he asked the Lieutenant who brought us in the car. This man had no objection but said he'd better ask the Captain. The Captain didn't mind but said he should ask the General, and he said "Why not? After all, he's their King!" So in this ancient castle, these modern prisoners of war from England, Borneo, Canada, Singapore, New Zealand, Allahabad, and South Africa, bowed their heads and prayed for their King.

The Führerin

Good morning, this is Mary Marvin Breckinridge in Berlin.

This morning the front pages of all the newspapers are covered with an account of the German successes in the first six months of the war, given out as a special communiqué by the German High Command. Among the accomplishments listed are the sinking of two million tons of shipping (they don't say how much of this is neutral shipping) and of one British battleship, one airplane carrier, and 8 destroyers, and the damaging of two battleships, one battle cruiser, 2 heavy cruisers, and a large number of destroyers and submarines. They also claim that the Air Force damaged 2 battleships, one airplane carrier, and two big cruisers, and destroyed 335 enemy planes. They announce that they have lost 11 u-boats, and other naval vessels and they point with pride to the preparation of the Army which is now ready to make a strong attack.

This talk of attack has been more pronounced during the last couple of days since the arrival of Under-Secretary Welles in Berlin. He saw Field-Marshall Göring this morning and will leave tonight for Switzerland. Whether the talk of military strength and readiness is for bargaining purposes, or whether this country feels it must force a military decision soon, one can only guess.

A question which interests me particularly is "What frontiers does Germany want in order to remain at peace?" Day before yesterday I asked this of the most prominent woman in Germany, Frau Scholz-Klink. She is the Führerin, or leader, of organized German womanhood and could therefore be called the feminine Hitler. Her answer was that the question of the independence of the central part of Poland was still undecided, that Bohemia and Moravia will remain Protectorates of Germany, and she said most forcefully, the Fatherland would have to get back its colonies which were stolen from it after the last war. The attitude of Frau Scholz-Klink is significant because she is the essence of the Nazi spirit, and works closely and loyally with Hitler who has charged her with bringing the women of the country into sympathy with his principles. She is the only woman among the hundred men of the directing committee of the Nazi Party, and she holds the honorary rank of Cabinet Minister.

I went to call on her at her headquarters, a former hospital now taken over by the Deutsches Frauenwerk which combines all the women's organizations in Germany, under one large Nazi directorship. No individual club can survive outside of it. It has subdivisions for various interests, such as social work, art, educational work, international affairs, and all ideas and activities are supervised by the three hundred busy young women in this clean, efficient-looking building.

As I waited in the office of Fräulein Paul, a trained nurse, who is second-in-command, and noticed her oil-painting of a soldier in helmet, her radio, and map of the western front on the wall the Führerin herself came in with outstretched hand to invite me into her office. One wall was covered with a gigantic map of Germany, and on the table were numerous photographs of Nazi leaders. The color-scheme of the pleasant room was green, as I had noticed in her other offices when I visited a Mothers School and a Brides School, for in every building she has an office with her name on the door, ready for her in case she ever drops in.

Frau Scholz-Klink sat in a deep chair by a tall window, a small figure, with blond braids wound about her head, wide face, small mouth, and no makeup. She wore a white tailored shirtwaist, a red chiffon tie and dark blue skirt, and looks too young to have four big children living. As her organization is occupied largely with helping mothers to run their houses and bring up their children well, I had asked if I could interview the leader in her own home, but I was told that she prefers to keep her private life separate from her public affairs. She is an untiring worker, and has little time left for homelike pleasures. Her eldest daughter, who is eighteen, is training to be a children's nurse, the other daughter is taking a course in a housekeeping school in the Rhineland, and the two younger boys are in a special cadet boarding school which trains leaders for the ~~Nazi Party~~ new state. All four are of course members of the ~~compulsory~~ organization for boys and girls called Hitler-jugend and Bund der Deutschen Mädel. ~~After their father died, their mother married a Dr. Scholz who is not in the public eye.~~ Frau Scholz-Klink joined the Nazi Party in 1928, and did such good work in organizing around her home in Baden and later in Hesse, and in starting the women's labor corps, that she was asked to come to Berlin to create and fill her present big job. Since then she has made her first trips outside Germany, to Italy and Finland, and last year to England. She understands a few words of English, but speaks only German. Now she leads the Frauen~~schaft~~werk and the National Socialist Frauenschaft which guides it. They have together between three and four million members, not necessarily members of the Nazi Party, but all Aryan, of course. She also has the titles of head of the Women's Department of the German Labor Front, which is the local form of ~~compulsory~~ trade union, and head of the Federation of Nurses, and she is responsible for women's work in the German Red Cross.

The Führerin told me that her Frauenwerk really functions efficiently, that because they follow authority, they command respect, and must give support. She emphasized that they are not working against the men, but rather for them, in woman's own sphere. As an example, she said that whenever a meeting of one of her groups took place, men were present officially to represent the Army, the Navy, the Nazi Party, the S.S. and the Storm Troups.

In the work of her organization, she says that one must work through reality to ideas. ~~Her ideal is "politische Erziehung durch praktische Arbeit"~~. In other words, if a woman sees that you can make her baby more healthy and her war rations go further, she will be more likely to think that you know how to run her country too. The practical work takes the form of mothers training centers, the obligatory half-year's work given by young girls as ~~mothers'~~ domestic helpers, the help given by women to their neighbors when their husbands are called to war, and various other activities. ~~None of these activities have changed since the war began, but many have been intensified.~~ Frau Scholz-Klink told me she did not think her organization would be needed any more after the ~~achievement of Greater Germany~~ thorough assimilation of National Socialist principles for Germany. She regards her womens organization as far better than the varied, disorganized, unauthorized activities in other democratic countries, where there is no national political purpose behind the banding together of women, but she thinks if the democratic countries had one outstanding woman, that they could achieve unity too. She said the Frauenwerk had representatives in various neutral countries, to work with the Germans there ~~and to cooperate with the women of each country, but that they had no representatives in the United States now.~~

Every year at the Nürnberg Party Rally the Führerin makes a speech, and I was given copies of her recent ones printed in English. ~~A few quotations will help to give you her announced point of view.~~ I quote: "There were three factors responsible for the destructive influences before our (she means the Nazi) time) These were Marxist materialism, liberal intellectualism, and ecclesiastical dogmatism." And again: "The doctrine of the freedom of the individual has begun to totter because earth is heavier than sand." and again later "When good becomes weak, it becomes charity."

As I left the headquarters, I was presented with copies of four publications which they out out monthly or fortnightly. These are mainly occupied with household and baby problems, ~~war recipes and making over clothes~~, but they also have articles on political subjects to guide the thoughts of the readers. ~~One of them prints a quotation from Hitler saying in effect that brotherliness is a sign of weakness, and Germany must be so strong that she doesn't need to be brotherly.~~ In the current number of Frauen-Warte, which has a paid circulation of one and a half million, the main article is entitled "The Robber State England". Among the anti-English cartoons and posters reproduced is one listing 21 assassinations attributed to the hand of the British Secret Service. Three of them are those of our Presidents Garfield and McKinley, and Abraham Lincoln.

The task which the Führerin has set for the women of Germany is, in her own words, "to replace the thesis of a nationless humanity with an ardent belief in ourselves".

NEWS

Good morning, this is Mary Marvin Breckinridge in Berlin.

Another U-boat has returned to Germany, boasting that it has sunk 36,000 tons of shipping. Several have come back with fine stories of accomplishment, when they get back. And the papers print an item from the German news agency in Amsterdam, which it got from London, but which has not yet brought any direct confirmation from the German High Command here. It says that the British ship "Domala" was damaged and set on fire in the Channel by three bombs from a German plane. Twenty out of forty-eight Englishmen and 88 out of 253 Indian seamen were missing. These lascars had just been set free by Germany two weeks ago. They were the last of some five hundred Indian seamen who were found on German boats at the outbreak of the war, and were therefore interned. They had their own camp near Hamburg, run by their steamship line, and supplied with their own food, and they stayed there for half a year until arrangements were made to release them. Then they were sent by special train to Holland, and placed on board a ship bound for India, but their new-given freedom didn't mean much, for over a third of them were lost soon after they sailed.

A short despatch from Rome quotes the Giornale d'Italia as saying that, although Italy doesn't want war, it will enter it when it becomes necessary. The despatch doesn't mention on which side. Perhaps they think that Italy's formal note of protest to England over the threatened seizure of her coal coming from Germany via Holland is a sign. However, all neutrals protest against the methods used in this war - not that they really expect to change the war, but more for the sake of their own self-respect.

Speaking of coal, the State Library in Berlin, which was closed for lack of it, was opened yesterday for the first time in several weeks.

A new book has just appeared to tell people how to get the most out of their clothing cards. It explains why clothes are so limited, and gives suggestions for transferring trimmings from old clothes, and on how to handle the stocking problem. The limit of six pairs of stockings a year is the hardest for the women to bear. By the way, a young American I know who went to the Leipzig Fair said the most interesting and striking thing he saw was fluorescent stockings that look flesh-colored by daylight, but were shown of course in a darkened room, with a fine effect on the men. The blacked-out streets here would look fascinating with nothing but luminous legs showing, if people could buy these stockings.

Another new wrinkle is a twelve-inch victrola record that has four pieces on each side. With one of these, you can hear a whole symphony without interruption.

It was announced yesterday by the chief of the division of foreign laborers that Germany had eight hundred thousand jobs vacant. Last year they had almost a hundred thousand Poles working on the land in Germany, not counting any prisoners, and they plan to bring in thousands more, almost half of them women. The Polish workers get their keep and a smal salary, and can send fifty marks (about twenty dollars) to their families in Poland. The thirty thousand Italians get the same pay as the Germans, and there are also 25 000 Slovaks and a few Hungarians working here. But the Poles are far the most numerous and will ~~continue to be~~ so.

The latest issue of the Warsaw German newspaper has more news about America than the Berlin papers. Each of these has an article on the lawsuit brought by 120 survivors of the Athenia, and a mention of the story of the British freighter Southgate. The Warsaw paper has three stories: one about a prizefight in Los Angeles, another wondering whether Greta Garbo is planning to leave America, because she has commissioned an architect to study Norwegian wooden houses in order to build her one in her native Sweden, and the third on the 160 year old dispute about the name of Bedloe's Island, the place which now has national importance because it supports the Statue of Liberty.

Good evening, this is Mary Marvin Breckinridge in Berlin.

According to a report from Amsterdam which is printed in the Berlin papers, a German submarine torpedoed the English tanker "Charles F. Meyer", of 10,500 tons, about thirty miles southwest of Hastings, last night. The tanker tried to get away at full speed, but was struck by a torpedo above the waterline. English torpedoboats and auxiliary warships which came on receiving her distress signal, found the tanker badly damaged. There is also announced the sinking of a Dutch motor vessel on its way from South Holland to Leith.

Today we learned that a week ago the marking of the new frontier between Germany and Russia was completed. There are 2820 markers along about a thousand miles of border. Now the Frontier Commission is busy with local work and the completion of documents relating to the new frontier.

Several Dutch ships carrying German coal from Holland to Italy have been detained by the English. Before this, the Germans have always urged the neutral countries, such as Denmark and Norway, to stand up to the English and object to ~~such war~~ their blockade methods; this time, they say it is a matter for Italy to decide for herself.

In the German movie theatres, the films are running for much longer time than during peace time. Because of the blackout and the severe winter, the attendance is much greater than in former years. Good films run from four to eight weeks. The production of new films is still proceeding, under the supervision of Propaganda Minister Goebbels, and the emphasis is on political subjects. One company is planning a film about Sir Roger Casement, the Irish revolutionary, and a submarine film, a film about colonial life, and one on the life of Diesel, inventor of the Diesel motor. Another company is preparing a film about the Boer War, with Emil Jannings in the role of President Krüger. Then it will make a film about Krupp, the armament manufacturer, one about the Irish revolution, and one on an episode from the last war, concerning the fight of an auxiliary war vessel. A new film will shortly be made in the German Alps where all the outdoor scenes show real mountain scenery, and no sets will be built. When you go to the movies in Berlin, at the beginning of the ~~performance~~ newsreel you see a very short film, with the same two men acting in a new episode each week. One comedian is always on the point of breaking some new littlelaw or regulation, and the other one comes along just in time to stop him and explain the error. The actors are funny enough to appeal to their public who make a point of being prompt to see them.

Yesterday the German High Command announced that a Heinkel airplane that was doing reconnaissance work over eastern France had made a forced landing after a fight with three enemy pursuit planes. The crash set fire to the plane, and two men, one of them wounded, made their way through the French lines back to their own lines, a distance of about two miles. For this exploit the German flyers were decorated by Field Marshall Goering. Today we have further details about this adventure from the pilot. He said that the purpose of his flight was reconnaissance over a certain area, and he had completed his task and taken his photographs when in the neighborhood of Metz, at an altitude of about 25 000 feet, three French pursuit planes appeared. The Germans shot with all their machineguns, but the return fire put one motor out of commission and also the radio. The pilot called back to the two men in the rear, but no one answered. Then another motor went dead, while the French planes were still shooting at them coming from left, right and all around. But only the German observer could shoot, and that forward, because the rear guns were out of action. When a shot hit the instrument board, it sent a part of it into his face. And when still at ninethousand feet, the pilot realized he had to make a forced landing, so he tried to glide to the German frontier, but had to land on the French side. He looked back and saw that the two men in the tail of the plane were dead, and helped the wounded observer out, and ran, all dressed in heavy flying suits, toward their lines. From all sides they were shot at by pursuing Frenchmen, and some of them ran after them at a distance of 150 yards. The Germans had seen Saarbrücken from the air and made for it, the pilot helping his wounded comrade, ~~his pistol in his hand~~, and they finally got through and arrived at their lines where they had of course been given up for lost or prisoners. The wounded man was taken to the first aid station, and later both had the satisfaction of being decorated on the successful outcome of their lucky adventure.

Breckinridge CBS NEWS March 6, 1940

Good evening, this is Mary Marvin Breckinridge in Berlin.

The cry for the freedom of the seas is now being taken up by Germany as a companion piece to the cry for living space. In this connection, Germany makes three points: First, that she must overpower the English claim to mastery of the seas, just as America did during the last war as regards her own waters and merchant shipping. This fight against English dominance is, according to Berlin, not aggression but defence. Second, the much-discussed disarmament after this war must be extended to include naval disarmament, meaning England's, and Third, that the English naval stations on foreign soil that provide a basis for sea mastery, must be done away with. In this connection, they say that these British naval bases in the Mediterranean, such as Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, and the Suez Canal have become "Untenable and unbearable", not only for Germany but for the Mediterranean peoples, for they are not positions for defence but for aggressive action through their help in the British blockade and their control of neutral shipping which the Germans call illegal and against international law. They do not say whether the sinking of neutral vessels is illegal or not, but they say they will continue to sink them if they are travelling in convoy or bound for enemy harbors, since it's impossible for a plane to determine whether or not such a ship is travelling voluntarily with English ships. And the German planes will use machine guns on the crews only when they do not follow the German orders or when the ship is in such a position that they might try to shoot back. Ships without lights will also be sunk, on the supposition that they have something to conceal. And then the German political circles declare that it is the duty of all nations to combine against England.

Yesterday the German Government said that the Italian protest to England over the seizure of her homeward bound ships carrying German coal, now said to number 7, was entirely Italy's affair; today the Foreign Office said it was one hundred percent behind that protest.

All the German papers are pleased with the news, which is played up prominently, that they have captured the first Englishmen on the western front. According to the High Command report, sixteen were taken prisoner by a German patrol east of the Mosel.

The Red Cross representatives, Mr. Nicholson and Mr. Wayne Taylor, have arrived in the General Government of Poland to supervise the allocation and distribution of medical supplies and clothing sent from the UnitedStates, to the civilian population of Poland. This will be done without regard to race, in the American way.

From Berlin

A headline arrested my attention in the evening paper last night. It read: "Germany fights for the peace of the whole world". It was the theme of a lecture given to an audience consisting of Hitler-Jugend, the National Socialist Teachers' organization, and the Northern Society. The talk was about England's desire for power, English lies. The lecturer said that England had a shopkeeper's mind, and was merely posing as the defender of civilization and freedom, and gave as examples of her falsity the slave trade and the Boer War, no dates. But the point that interested me was that peace, and in a roundabout way civilization and freedom, are evidently still held as ideals among the German people, so the leaders must address them in those terms. Since the principles for which the Allies fight are popular in Germany, their leaders want the people to know that they stand for them too, and thus minimize the effect of British propaganda.

The German High Command announces today that there was some artillery fire and patrol activity along the western front. The Air Force has been doing reconnaissance flying over Great Britain and over the northern and eastern parts of France. Only one plane is reported missing.

This war has provided so little material for fine action stories that the biggest article in the official paper today is about the last war, when a German airship came to grief near London. On the second page is a graphic account of his adventure by a man who was on a German plane a couple of days ago, in one of the raids in which eleven ships were sunk. They were said to be either in convoy or blacked out. The flyer's account does not mention the nationality of any of the ships which he attacked. And the Amilia Lauro, a ship of over 5000 tons, which is announced as being in flames in the Channel as the result of an attack by a German plane, is described as an English ship. Perhaps the interruption in coal shipping to Italy has something to do with the trip of the Foreign Minister, Herr von Ribbentrop, to Rome today, This was a sudden move, arranged on the spur of the moment. Last night at ten o'clock the diplomats and journalists in Rome did not know of his impending visit. This morning at nine Herr von Ribbentrop left Berlin in a special train for Rome, where he is expected to arrive tomorrow afternoon, to stay for several days.

The article describing his trip speaks of the solidarity of the Axis friendship, and stresses the fact that, unlike the democracies, totalitarian states can have a permanence of foreign policy. The article speaks only of Italy, not of Russia. It also said that only the Axis states can plan for the future, because of this continuity in which they have confidence, but they do not give out the plans. The Italians must need some friendly help now, for eleven of their ships bearing coal have been detained by the British. (Censored: and one has been sunk by the Germans, with the loss of several Italian sailors.)

It is believed that Herr von Ribbentrop's visit to Italy is also related to peace proposals for the Russo-Finnish war. In this connection it is of interest to learn that Mr. Svinhufvud, former president of Finland, arrived in Berlin yesterday. He will stay here a few days, and then he too will go to Rome.

The interruption of the coal trade shows that there is still enough to export through Holland, although coal is still difficult to obtain in Berlin. And there is still enough to produce almost half the gasoline used here. For several years it has been allowed to add to gasoline up to thirty percent of potato alcohol, but at present only about ten to twenty percent is used. The lack of the genuine article has encouraged the creation and use of various substitutes. These creations are known as ersatz materials, and when an article is standardized to one product for the country, it is called Einheit.

Soap is an einheit product, but there are two kinds, for washing persons and for washing clothes.* The shortage of real soap is due to the shortage of fats and oils, which affects automobiles, shampoos, treatment of wooden floors and all sorts of things. All materials sold in Germany are part wood, from ten to fifty percent, as I was told when I was shown samples at a sewing class in a Mothers School in one of the poorer districts of Berlin. One can also have a dress made of milk, for it can be woven from yarn made from cotton wool, which is made from casein.

A girl with whom I was having mixed German tea the other day told me that a friend of hers was having a fine business boom now, and had built a new wing onto his factory. He makes patent medicine, for stomach trouble. As everybody knows, the former German greeting of Gruss Gott gave way some time ago to Heil Hitler, which is used most by Nazi Party members and officials. I hear that lately around Munich they're going back to God again. And I return you now to Columbia, New York.

MEMORIAL SERVICE

From Berlin

Number 29
March 10, 1940
Morning

Red German flags with swastikas on them were flying from every door and roof along the wide boulevard of Unter den Linden this morning and Storm Troopers, S.S. men and policemen lined the sidewalks from the Chancellery on the Wilhelmstrasse to the old Military Museum as I walked down to attend the service. Inside the museum, I went by planes from the last war, ancient cannons, old uniforms and coats of mail, to a window on the second floor where the press representatives were allowed. In the big glass-roofed hall stood a gathering of high officers on either side of a wide red matting and behind them stood about 200 soldiers who were wounded in Poland in the most recent of Germany's wars. The only civilians on the floor were Sven Hedin, the Swedish explorer who is visiting here, and a couple of Cabinet Ministers. The atmosphere was solemn.

Someone called out 'Attention, the Führer', and Hitler walked in accompanied by his three heads of military strength, Göring, Raeder and von Brauchitch, while everyone stood at salute. They stood quietly in the front row while the military orchestra played Beethoven's Eroica. Then Hitler took his place behind the rostrum, in front of a large model of the Nazi Iron Cross dated 1939, flanked by twenty flags on each side. He wore a military-looking uniform which he has designed for himself. He spoke without gestures and without excitement, but it was difficult to understand because of the echo in the building. At the end there was no applause, and he stepped back to the front row while a simple soldier, without decorations or insignia, a living Unknown Soldier, took the rostrum and received the salute while the band played two national anthems. The feeling was one of paying tribute to the spirit of Germany rather than to the Nazi Party.

The officers all strolled out to the War Memorial next door, and I watched from a window, next to the stuffed horse of Frederick the Great. Troops were drawn up in line before the partly-open building, and Hitler and Göring and about half a dozen other high officials followed a wreath borne by four soldiers into it, no one else. When they came out, the soldiers passed in review, one company each from the Army, the Navy and the Air Force, goosestepping. "This is the best of all", said the wrinkled little museum guard beside me. Then Hitler got down from the pedestal which he had been on, and climbed into the front seat of a glass-enclosed car, and drove off, followed by other cars full of guards and officers, along the street which is about 150 feet wide. No one except guards were allowed on the memorial side, but on the far side of the street the public stood behind the S.S. men, watching the fine ceremony in the bright sunshine. It was really a genuine tribute to a dominant part of German life throughout history.

As I left the museum, I went into the Memorial. Inside, the only symbol on the wall was a cross, Christian, not Iron, behind the monument, which was surrounded by wreaths. The biggest one was of white lilies and tulips, and the red ribbon on it said simply 'Adolf Hitler'.

Amsterdam 12:[redacted] - 12:15 Dutch Time

Easter was hardly a period of hope and promise in Holland this year, with the war blazing like a forest fire all around, that might leap its borders and attack this country at any time. But the Hollanders were calm and even cheerful behind their clever defences. There are two major lines of defence, one about eighty miles from Amsterdam, and one about thirty miles. The residence of the former German Kaiser lies between the two, surrounded by barracks and fortifications.

I spent last weekend on the outer line of defence, on the shore of of Ijssel River, with a large and friendly Dutch family. Their little beach is entirely under water, and the canal at the end of the garden was higher than it has ever been, for this is in part of the ~~inundation sh~~ inundated area. Since most of Holland is under sea-level, and sections are separated by dikes, all they have to do is to divert the water from rivers to cover the fields, and there are thousands of acres now under water, and still it is rising. An invading army could not ~~[redacted]~~ be sure whether the water was three feet deep or six feet deep, but it could be sure that the bottom was slimy mud, and very difficult to cross. And while soldiers ~~were~~ would be struggling and tanks ~~[redacted]~~ would be getting stuck, Dutch soldiers ~~[redacted]~~ would be firing at them with the latest thing in rifles and machine guns from a highly original kind of trench. Because the land is below sea-level, an ordinary trench is immediately full of water, so the Dutch build a ~~[redacted]~~ ridge of earth with wooden walls inside, and a space between them, which makes a high and safe protection. The invading army, on the other hand, cannot dig themselves in because of all the water.—In the last six months the Dutch defences have been tremendously improved, and they are still being worked on. ~~The highway~~ More than five hundred pillboxes for machine guns and anti-aircraft guns are scattered about this district. Most of them are ingeniously camouflaged to look like farm buildings, or sod-covered mounds. Yesterday afternoon I put on my rubber boots and walked along a water-covered brick roadway to ~~a~~ farm on an island which turned out to be full of Dutch soldiers in their grey-green uniforms. They had put a sign on a plain woodshed saying 'Villa of World Peace', but inside was a machine gun.—And across the water was a large chicken-coop, with perhaps twenty divisions, but actually it was a cleverly painted cement pillbox, with only two openings out of which peered two ~~[redacted]~~ heavy guns, like large and watchful eyes. ¶ And the Dutch are watchful, and determined not to let any foreign army invade their soil. In the first place, they behave in such a strictly neutral manner that no other country has any cause for complaint; in the second place, they plan their defences to suit their own conditions. They have already chosen where they will fight the invaders, where the defence will occupy strong positions, and the attackers will have nothing but mud and water. This district is not entirely flooded yet, but William Lindsay White told me that he had visited a whole province that was already evacuated, the farmers' families gone, and soldiers living in the farmhouses. On Sunday we had a visit from a young Dutch couple who live only five miles this side of the border. They said that their home was beyond the area evacuated, because the Army knew that they could not hope to put up an effective fight in that district, and they would have to be left to the mercy of the invaders.

~~The Netherlands will defend themselves most effectively with brains, water, and invincible determination.~~ Yesterday was a holiday, and near our house some soldiers in bright blue and orange jerseys were playing football. Hundreds of townspeople and country people had come on their bicycles to enjoy the sport on the sunny spring day. But they would not have enoyed it so much if they had not known that on the big bridge over the Ijssel nearby, soldiers with guns held horizontal and bayonets fixed, were patrolling between the tank traps, day and night. For the Netherlands will defend themselves most effectively with brains, water, and [invincible] determination.

Breckinridge CBS SPIES IN HOLLAND #31 April 1, 1940 Morning

The Dutch newspapers have been full of accounts of the trials of spies lately. Only last week two men were convicted of operating a secret wireless transmitter near Rotterdam and sending reports on the weather and the condition of the terrain to Germany. They were tried before judges (they dont have juries in Holland) in an ordinary court, and most of the spy trials are open to the public. In this case the Public Prosecutor asked that they be given five years, but they got six, which is the maximum for espionage now. However, the Government is planning to raise the possible term of conviction to fifteen years, because spies are so numerous.

The geographical position of Holland makes it an ideal spy capitol. The Germans come here to get news of the country and of shipping, and the English come here chiefly to get news of the Germans. The most famous case internationally of this was the Venlo incident of early last November, when two Englishmen and a Dutch chauffeur were captured on the Dutch border by Germans, and a Dutch Control officer with them was shot. ~~Since the officer belonged to the Dutch Military Intelligence, no protest could very well be made by Holland~~ censored.

The line between actual spying and securing general information is a difficult one to draw. It is interesting to note that, according to the Government Press Service here, there are attached to the Press Department of the British Legation at the Hague two Englishmen and one Dutchman, and to the German Legation between thirty and forty German journalists. One of them was asked by the Dutch Government to leave the country recently. And living here in Holland are a large number of German refugees and thirty thousand German maids, for suspicious people to speculate on. The Department of Justice gives out no information on the subject of spies, except to say that all aliens are watched. But the cases that have been tried furnish some interesting details.

A couple of days ago a former Chief Clerk in the Ministry of Economic Affairs and a Departmental Chief in the Ministry of Social Affairs were sent to jail for transmitting to a foreign power photostatic copies of lists of Dutch ships and their cargoes held in the English Downs. They identified one of the men because a piece of his living room carpet appeared in the picture of one of the lists which he had photographed at home.

There was another case of spying through this country recently. One Dutchman, living in France, sent secret information to his brother in Holland. He took the papers to a little cafe which straddled the border, like the one in the old play 'Lightnin'. Entering on the Dutch side, he walked through to a room on the German side and delivered the papers to a German there, but was eventually picked up by the Dutch Secret Service. To avoid unauthorized crossing of the frontier in Limburg, the Germans have built a barbed wire fence about six feet high with an electrified wire along the top. Since March 15th it is almost impossible to cross the border in this neighborhood even at the regular gates, and the daily workmen have to get a new permit each day, to be allowed into Germany.

On one of Holland's frontiers, the preparations for defence include not only tank traps and pillboxes, but bridges ready to be exploded and trees to be dynamited so they will fall across the road. At one time the fuses on these trees disappeared day after day, and as no one but a Dutch soldier was allowed to walk on that road, it was difficult to catch the spy who had been removing the fuses. So one day they gave an order that no soldier in that neighborhood was to salute his officer, and in the course of the day three soldiers saluted and were immediately arrested and found to be spies in stolen uniforms. An amusing trick is to choose a guttural Dutch word for password, sounding like a nether gargle, which no foreigner can possibly pronounce!

A radio executive I know who motored back to Amsterdam from southern Holland last week was stopped nine times by soldiers who were trying to find out who was operating signalling lights at night. These are sent by flashlight or by pistols with light balls such as are used by pilots. They are seen chiefly around Utrecht, and are probably intended to give the direction to German planes as they fly over Holland to raid the enemy.

A rumor went around some time ago that the secret service of a belligerent power had taken over a room in a hotel overlooking the only exit to the railway station at the Hague, and had set up a camera with excellent long-focus lens to photograph special people they were watching, as they came out of the station.

Although so far only Dutch and German nationals have been tried in spy cases, there has been just one case involving spying on behalf of the Allies. In this case a Dutchman established himself on a little island near the top of the north coast of Holland and reported the movements of German ships and planes by telephone and wireless to another Dutchman on the mainland who sent it on to the British and the French.

Holland is a great center also for counterespionage, but those stories are known only by people in the business. And I have never met a member of the British Secret Service nor of the Gestapo --- at least, I dont think I have.

Breckinridge CBS CONTRABAND #32 April 4, 1940

12:10:10 — 12:14:30

Thirty-six Dutch boats are now detained in the Downs off England, according to figures published this morning, and the English are planning to intensify the blockade in the North Sea next week. Their Navy watches the few channels left open for shipping, between the extensive mine fields. All countries are supposed to inform the neutrals about the location of their minefields, but the Germans sometimes lay them along merchant routes without notifying anyone, saying that they are allowed to lay uncharted mines to achieve a military objective. So after the neutral ships have passed through the contraband control station in the Downs, the British tell them the location of the new minefields, as far as they are known. This is one reason why the neutral ships stop when asked by the British navy, and another is that if they dont, the Dutch consignees may be put on the blacklist, and then no British subject is allowed to trade with them. Part of this list is published by the Stationery Office in London, and part is confidential. Practically all, or maybe all, the ships bound for Holland are intercepted by the British, but last autumn one got through. The Atlas was seen by a navy boat and sent a message "You should go to the Downs". The Captain was not interested, so he went on his way. He got a second message, and answered "It's a matter of opinion, but I dont think I should", and the British sent a last message "Good luck". One Dutchman told me that England can afford to be humane, because she is stronger.

The Germans intercept some ships bound for Holland too, but apparently not all. Only a few go to the contraband station at Kiel, though there are some there now, bound from Finland with wood. This is partly because the Netherlands have naturally less shipping trade through the Baltic, the German sphere, and partly because Germans have other methods of dealing with neutral shipping.

Since the war began, 229 people have been killed through the sinking of 27 Dutch merchant ships, [redacted]. None of these can be blamed on the Allies.

Yesterday I climbed up a twenty-foot sloping ladder to board a Dutch freighter, with flags painted all over it, which recently arrived from South America with a cargo of linseed and corn. She'd spent three idle weeks in the Downs, a mile or so off Deal, when the crew was not allowed to go ashore. The Netherlands Government had guaranteed that the cargo was for use in this country, and not for export, so nothing was removed. On their way home they saw floating mines, but didn't stop to shoot at them, but informed a naval vessel. The jovial young Chief Mate showed me the new raft and the motorboat which have been added to the ordinary lifeboats since the war began. (Censored 1: ~~[illegible] that they contained water and provisions, unlike the lifeboat of the pathetic Pachino victims.~~) And in a few days he will sail again through waters where mines and torpodoes are waiting for neutral ships, but he's not afraid, and the thing he minds most is leaving his sweet new bride.

The British Contraband list includes practically everything from soup to nuts, and the Germans told me that they follow the same list. ~~When the British capture any contraband, they unload it at the Downs where it undergoes a preliminary examination. Then the Dutch consignee gets a chance to prove that the seizure is unwarranted as it is not destined for the enemy. If he succeeds, which happens fairly often, he gets the goods back; otherwise they become the property of the British Government.~~ So far the English have removed from Holland-bound boats such things as steel plates and ores from the United States, ~~wood and~~ timber from Jugoslavia, and hides, skins and oil.

~~Sailors on board these boats tell of sighting British patrol boats, who signal them to stop and then send smart-looking officers aboard to inspect the ships' papers, and they say the officers are very polite. They say the Germans are polite too, when they come on board.~~

Curiously enough, only a few days ago the Germans were sending a hearty note of thanks to some Dutch fishermen who had rescued four German aviators adrift in a rubber boat, and at the same time other German aviators were sinking the Dutch fishing-ship Protinus, with a catch destined for Holland, (censored ~~[illegible] the crew with machine guns,~~) and killing ~~half~~ some of the crew, all in the name of contraband control. This incident has made Dutch people very angry indeed.

I was talking recently to a high shipping authority here, who feels that there will be important developments next week regarding the change of status of Norwegian territorial waters, which is now disputed by England and Germany. ~~The only way to get through~~ the blockade now from the Atlantic is to go to the port of Narvik, near the top of Norway, and sail in its territorial waters to the southern tip, and then leap in a zigzag course across the North Sea, and hope you're lucky. The Swedes are digging a channel, to be completed in July, where their own territorial waters are too shallow for safe shipping, chiefly to avoid interference in their co~~astwise trade~~.

War conditions have deeply affected Holland's most vital industry, for her export and trans-shipment trade are steadily decreasing, and every week more ships are sunk. The usual attitude of the Netherlander ~~to the~~ toward the British blockade is that it is a nuisance, as it delays the ships for days and weeks, but, they say, at least they dont kill anyone.

In the office of the shipping executive, a high panelled room with big windows overlooking the harbor of Amsterdam, is a large carved-oak seal showing a galleon at sea surrounded by a Latin motto which must be Holland's, "Navigare Necesse". And although this new kind of war has brought a new kind of danger to neutral shipping, it will take more than that to beat the Dutch.

Here in Holland everyone has an eye cocked northward, to watch events around Norway. ~~This morning the leading newspapers played up the Scandinavian developments on their leading articles, and~~ This evening the Telegraaf, ~~the~~ which has the biggest circulation in Holland, gives them Scandinavian developments practically the whole of the front page, and most of the second page too. And there is also a prominent account of the sinking of the Norwegian ship Navarro, and a couple of long, illustrated articles on modern Dutch architecture, and on yesterday's fashion show held in Amsterdam by the leading French dressmakers, which show that these people have not lost their traditional balance.

But about this Norway situation --- On one side the Dutch breathe an excusable sigh of relief that the spotlight has been taken off them, at least for the moment, and on the other side they are worried about their shipping trade with Norway, which has always been fairly extensive. ~~They wonder what will become of it.~~ I read A little article in this evening's edition of the conservative paper Handelsblatt which says that the port of Bremen is jammed, and that some Dutch ships, bound homeward with Finnish plywood, are not allowed to leave; that the wharves at Emden which used to unload ore from Narvik, Norway, on its way to the ~~Ruhr~~ industrial region of the Ruhr, are empty, and that gravel and sand for building fortifications in Schleswig-Holstein are arriving by canal from the south. Rumor has it that there are five German divisions in Stettin, and others near the frontier between Germany and Denmark, making fifteen divisions in the north of Germany, ready to be moved at a moment's notice. Hollanders expect some action, but they dont know exactly where and what kind.

Yesterday a tobacco broker told me that he'd been playing his Sunday afternoon round of golf with a business friend of his, and they had agreed ~~that~~ they wouldn't be surprised if Germany took Denmark, as it would be far easier from a military point of view than taking Holland, but they thought that Germany would only move if she had to show the folks at home some tangible sign of success to compensate them for the restricted life they are living. But this was before England laid her minefields along the Norwegian ~~territorial~~ coast, and pulled the attention of the world northward to the Norwegian territorial waters as I predicted last Thursday.

The semi-official attitude toward the English action is that it is against the rules of international law, but privately, people here think that the Norwegians suffered so many ships and men lost through German action, like the Dutch but to an even greater degree, that they do not regret a little punishment given out by the one country which, as a declared enemy, should do it.

But the Dutch are not forgetting their own position, and have made plans for emergency well in advance. In a week or so they will start a new factory near Rotterdam to make tin cans, for so far the only important factory is in a dangerous part of the country. They figure that in case of invasion by a foreign power, they could drive 285,000 cows back from the other side of the water barrier to this safer side, but ~~they knew they~~ could not feed them, so the idea is to slaughter them immediately and put them into ~~hundreds of thousands~~ millions of cans.

The plans for ~~the~~ evacuation have been completed for months, ~~and~~ ~~everyone who now lives beyond the water barrier knows exactly to which house and which family he will go in time of danger. Many will be evacuated to Amsterdam.~~ Now the evacuation officials ~~who planned the evacuation have nothing to do, so they~~ are perfecting their work, and they are combing in similar types and tastes from all over Holland. They ~~plan to~~ will billet vegetarians together, for instance, and ~~they~~ will divide people according to religion, so that a Catholic may stay with a Catholic, and a Lutheran with a Lutheran. This is important in a country where brass bands, football clubs, ~~and even~~ and even goatbreeders associations dogshows are organized by religions. At the moment this work doesn't look necessary, but the Dutch are an even-tempered, agreeable people and even if war should come to them, they will do their best to live a pleasant life.

Holland is wearing her little red riding hood of neutrality, but she's a bit scared just the same as she goes through the woods. Even though the wolf may be far away, he might turn up at any moment, and the innocence of neutrality is no longer a safeguard. The strict Dutch interpretation of neutrality goes to the point where she refuses to discuss military cooperation with any belligerent power in case of attack by another power. This refusal annoys the British, who know that in case of invasion from the east, Holland counts on the help of the Royal Air Force and maybe other units, yet will not even consent to talk about plans in advance.

But the Netherlands are willing, and even determined, to defend their country in battle against an aggressor, and since the events in Scandinavia of the last few days, they have adopted measures far more severe than those taken on last November 11th, when they had the biggest scare to date, with some reason. Now they have cancelled all types of leave, and changed all train schedules for two days in order to move troops. A German journalist told me that some of them went to the seashore, but I dont know where he heard that report.

Today, as I went to the Hague in one of the few trains, I saw ~~patrols~~ soldiers on bicycles pedalling in formation between fields which are just beginning to bloom with big patches of purple and yellow crocusses, and on the highways were military motorcycle despatch riders in leather suits. No additional classes have been mobilized, and the only new men in training belong to the age-group which was called up on April first, according to regular plans. Three nineteen-year-old elevator boys from my hotel went, with long faces, because Hollanders are not militaristic and dont enjoy such a life, but when they feel danger threatening their country, I think they'll wake up and show more keenness.

Many barges have been moved toward this section of the country, partly so that they will not be handy for bridge-building near the border, and partly to get them out of the way when they started the greatest inundations yet undertaken. Incidentally, the gasoline for air force and army use is kept stored in barges, where it is safely hidden, and movable.

The rising waters and moving soldiers are the most conspicuous signs of renewed vigilance, but the Army Headquarters assure me that certain other measures have been taken which they do not divulge for fear of alarming the population. At the moment the people here are still calm, and living, working and eating as if life would always go on this way. They dont know the details of the present situation, but they do know that they are far better prepared than they were in September, ~~that defence arrangements have been made as efficient as possible, and that they will be called when they are needed.~~

~~The cancellation of all army leave has not upset them, for they have been through scares before, and they say it is better to be called a half hour too soon than twenty-four hours too late.~~

Hollanders will not accept the fate of Denmark. Her people are tremendously interested in following the war in the North, and are quite aware of the relationship between the Scandinavian situation and their own country. A well-informed world traveller told me this morning that he expected Germany to go into Sweden in a couple of days, because it may be their only way to reach their troops in Norway. Many Hollanders feel - but of course no one knows - that until Germany has either stabilized her position in Norway or been definitely removed from there, it will not take the initiative in military action in other parts of Europe.

But then Holland's turn may come, and now she is prepared to do her utmost, and will remain 'at the ready' for some time. And when the first foreigner attacks, he will receive not butter, but bullets.

FROM HOLLAND

Holland is still hearing 'Le Scare du Printemps' but this one is not by a Pole. And, the sound has been intensified by a story which is said to have appeared in the Washington Evening Star to the effect that a troopship had left England for either Norway or Holland. This story has been proved untrue, as regards Holland, for there are no troopships anywhere near the coast. The Dutch say that an invasion by England is highly improbable, even fantastic. But the American newspaper report has been taken up and broadcast over the German radio, which is how people here know about it, and it has made them feel worried, and downright annoyed: 'Just one more story like that', they say, 'and the Germans will have a fine excuse to come in to forestall the British'.

This is the first time since I have been in Holland that I have felt real uneasiness among ordinary people, as they see Germany developing the forestalling theme that she used on Denmark and Norway. Yesterday General Roëll former Commander in Chief of the Field Army, made a speech in Amsterdam, pointing to Denmark as a warning of what happens when you allow weakness to develop from within. He mentioned the many spy trials here as a bad sign, and said there were traitors lurking everywhere, some of them dressed as soldiers, who would be a danger if this neutral country were attacked. He said Holland should not tolerate those people, and he pointed to Denmark as a terrifying example of what can happen to a people if the spirit of determination within the country is not strong. [General Roëll said that as Holland would never start a war on its own initiative but had only prepared its armed forces to withstand aggression, total defence was the only way to resist the horrors of modern warfare. Total defence means that every Hollander who is able to cooperate in any way in the defence of the country must if necessary sacrifice his personal interests. The General praised the Government for the precautionary measures that have been taken and ended by saying "We know that it is our Queen who is an example for all of us in her unfailing interest, energy and perserverance for the welfare and the defence of the country, in conformity with an old motto of the House of Orange: Be Vigilant and Trust in God".]

Train service is normal again today, after four days of interrupted schedules for troop movements. This morning 170 diplomats, including the British, French and Polish Ministers and their staffs, came through Holland from Copenhagen. They spent three hours in the Hague before going on to Brussels. ~~The party included the Minister to Denmark from Great Britain, France, They arrived in the Hague at seven o'clock this morning, and left at 10:07 for Brussels. The British Minister showed his pleasure at the news of the British sinking of seven German destroyers near Narvik yesterday. When a friend of mine asked for news of his English fellow-journalists in Copenhagen, the diplomats said they had just disappeared.~~

A Royal Decree was issued yesterday extending the area which has been under martial law since last November first so that it now includes most of the Netherlands. The degree of martial law has been made more severe all along the eastern frontier and along the sea.

Last night extensive military manoeuvres were held in all the big towns and in many country districts as well. A cook I know in a small town was at the movies with her boy friend, a soldier, when the manager of the theatre got up and announced that all the soldiers should report at once for manoeuvres. Soon the main road was filled with motorized troops, soldiers on bicycles, infantry and guns. They marched to an open space and the cook and her family heard the guns being fired in practice all night long, and in the morning the soldiers marched back again, still looking fresh and sturdy, and the neighbors who were not already awakened by the guns were roused by the tramping boots and gay laughter under their windows.

* Train service etc.

~~Part of the military activities last night consisted in checking up on the activities of all the civilians who were out late. A foreign diplomat in the Hague was telephoned to in the middle of the night by his Legation and asked to come to his office immediately, so he threw on his overcoat over his pyjamas and rushed down the street. His unusual and hurried appearance caused him to be stopped three times by soldiers, and as he did not have his identification papers with him in his pyjama pocket, he spent some time explaining his way to freedom.~~

In the afternoon yesterday there was a drill in Amsterdam for the Volunteer Fire Brigade, when five hundred of their members rushed to their little local fire stations, and dragged their hand pumps through the streets, at a fast trot, followed by excited small boys, and then put out mock fires as part of their regular practice. There was also a tryout of all the anti-aircraft sirens, as the newspapers had announced in the morning, but I didn't hear a sound — perhaps that was when my head was under the hairdryer. But some new American journalists who have just arrived said that the Amsterdam sirens are not a patch on Paris! + The Stock market etc. - see p 4

~~The increasing number of journalists~~ here, especially Americans, may be a sign of something. One is on his way to Germany, a couple were on their way to Scandinavia when the situation changed rapidly, and now no one knows how to get there, and some have come to Holland, just because it may be interesting here. Last night I had a cocktail with some of them in the lounge of my hotel, which is usually full of Amsterdam people who want to celebrate on Saturday night, but there was no one there but ourselves and one other group of foreigners. We went on to dinner at a fairly big popular restaurant, and it was equally empty. Although the Dutch are not at all excited, they are still apprehensive, and cannot enjoy themselves with a free mind as they did before. [+ stock market So it is perhaps just as well that the German theatrical company which was scheduled to come here from Munich to play tomorrow and Tuesday, cancelled their engagement a couple of days ago. I dont know if they would have had ~~a large audience~~.]

On my way out to this studio, I drive ~~through~~ past tank traps and ~~past~~ pillboxes and other fortifications. Since the snow and ice have gone, the Dutch have changed many of their wood-and-earth machinegun nests into solid concrete, now covered by sod with nice green grass and very hard to see. The moats in front of them are fast disappearing because the water is rising all through the polders. Only fifteen minutes by car from the center of Amsterdam the fields are now half grass, half water, and the cows wearing burlap overcoats stand with their feet in the water and nibble the grass which is still showing.

~~My taxi driver~~ today told me he had driven a ~~party of~~ few Russians down to Flushing, on the coast, near Belgium, a few days ago. They were going to visit the Molotov, the ship which Russia has ordered built in Holland. They were stopped by careful, polite Dutch soldiers on the way in, who looked at their passports and permit, and checked them again when they went out of the district. The driver told me one thing that interested me very much. He said that ~~there was a~~ besides war vessel and some small minelayers and sweepers down there, there were fortifications and a lot of guns, and the guns, said he, ~~pointed toward England~~ the land.

[~~Holland has a large proportion of radio listeners, and they will be listening carefully to the news from various countries now, for they are eager for news and there wont be any more newspapers until tomorrow evening.~~] This morning one of the two big papers published a half-page of eleven war cartoons, from America, Denmark, England and France. Only one, the smallest one, was pro-German. And There is an advertisement in this paper, saying that this is the beginning of what they dall, in perfect English, Surprise Week. The ad refers to surprise packages of hyacinths and begonias, which are being given out by a florist, but he has thought of a timely angle: we all wonder what will happen to Holland in SurpriseWeek.

The Stock Market has been lower this week, but there has been no panic. Things picked up a bit after the report that the British had taken Bergen and Trondjheim, but dropped again as soon as the report was found to be false. Yesterday was the second inscription day, [~~out of about twenty in the course of the usual spring season,~~] for the big tobacco market here. A ~~big~~ importer told me that the market was very high - higher than last week, in fact - and that the prices were fifty to one hundred percent higher than last year. There were not many German buyers, as most of them had left after the first inscription day a week ago, and the buyers were mostly Dutch tobacco dealers. The importer thought that the reason for the good market was that people preferred to have their property in goods rather than in cash.

Interview with Mr. Mussert

by M. Breckinridge April 20, 1940

all censored ~~Number 30~~ not given

To get a fair idea of the Dutch Nazi organization in Holland, I went to see ~~XXXXXXXXXXX~~Mr. Mussert, the leader, in his fine headquarters in Utrecht, the fourth city of Holland, which lies near the center of the country. Before the interview was granted, I had to show my passport and my letter of ~~XXXXXXXXXX~~ authorization from the Columbia Broadcasting System, and I was asked if I were known at the American Legation and Consulate. Everything being satisfactory, I was received by an important official ~~who calls himself "The man behind the Butcher"~~ in his office overlooking a wide, sunny avenue. Both he and the other officers wore black shirts, which are not allowed to be worn on the street, and he had the triangular Nazi pin in his buttonhole, and also as cufflinks, and they salute each other with the usual Nazi salute from the elbow. After a cup of coffee I was ushered into a large room at the back of the house overlooking the garden. At the far end of the room was a large ~~plain~~ green-covered desk, and from behind it Mr. Mussert rose and crossed the room to greet me cordially. He is a man of middle height, stocky, and dressed in a black uniform with sam brown belt and orange insignia. He was a State ~~Engineer~~ official, and was the Chief Engineer in the Province of Utrecht for Roads and Bridges until May 1, 1934, when he said he was fired for being a Nazi, which he had been for three years. He denied that he had worked on Holland's first line of defence, as I had previously heard. ~~But since~~ For the last six years he has devoted his whole time to the National Socialist movement in Holland. One of the first things he did was to go to Italy where he was received by Mussolini, who gave him an autographed photograph which hangs on Mr. Mussert's wall, equally placed with one of Hitler. The leader will not say whether or not he has ever met Hitler, but says of both dictators; "I have the greatest respect for Mussolini and Hitler. They are the builders of the new Europe." Between their photographs is a large oil painting symbolizing the avarice of capitolism, represented by New York's skyscrapers; the destruction of communisim, with tumbrils and a damaged crucifi and a young man, the spirit of Naziism, who, while stamping on the books of Voltaire, Danton and Marx, ~~who~~ looks aloft for leadership.

Speaking English fairly easily, the leader told me that the socialism part of his program is the same as that in Germany, but the nationalism is somewhat different, as they feel that they are Hollanders and not Germans. When I asked what he wanted for the Netherlands that they do not now have, he said his aim was to unite the people of Holland under one strong government under National Socialist principles. The burning question in Holland now, and I think one of the reasons for the declaration of martial law throughout the whole country by the Prime Minister on Friday, is "In the case of a possible attack on Holland by Germany, would ~~you they~~ the Dutch Nazis use German help to achieve their aims in Holland, or would they fight for their Queen?" When I put this question to the leader, he replied that since no N.S.B.s were allowed to be officers in the Army any more, they would do absolutely nothing, but sit like this, said he, folding his arms and leaning back in his chair. He sneers at the idea of freedom in Holland, and says that Dutch Nazis are suspected and ostracized, and even fired from their jobs. For this reason not all his members declare their membership in the N.S.B., so there are secret members, and the total number is not announced. Mr Mussert said that there were between thirty and forty thousand on their lists, but he would not say ~~how~~ exactly because of the government. Their pledge is as follows; "I believe in the leading principles of the National Socialist movement. I am prepared to work with all my strength to build the new state. I promise faithfulness and obedience to leadership. If my views cause me to change my allegiance, I can leave the Party on the one condition that I do no damage to the Party." The leader denies the widely-~~held~~- believed fact that he receives money from Germany, or that he did before the war, and says that all he has to do is to say he needs money, and his members will give it to him, and they even bring him rings and silver. One of the lieutenants showed me a card, nameless for safety, bearing about twenty stamps with the leader's head on them, amounting to about 25 gilders, which showed that the owner had contributed about thirteen dollars to the cause. The women in the Party, who are in about the same number as men in the cities, and somewhat less in the country districts, are particularly valuable for moneyraising, and also in propaganda work.

When the Constitution of the Dutch Nazis was written in 1931, which has not been changed since then, there was no mention in it of the word 'Jew.' However, after the Nazis came to power in Germany, they began to realize in Holland that the Jews were a problem, and Mr. Mussert says that he agrees with Mussolini that the greater part of them must be deported. For this he has outlined a scheme for a Jewish settlement in Dutch Guiana, on the shores of South America. *

With the Communists the Nazis have nothing to do. The leader regards the pact between Germany and Russia of last August as being a political and not an ideological understanding, and he does not believe in the future of communism, and said that the two countries just decided not to fight each other for the pleasure of England. England's 'plutocracy', as they say in the Völkischer Beobachter' is as repugnant to Dutch Nazis as it is to German. The leader here says 'This war will decide between democracy and National Socialism. If ~~England~~ Germany and Italy win, it will be the end of capitalism in Europe, and ~~then~~ I hope that then Holland will be united and independent". Holland has not been involved in a war for over 130 years, and is determined to keep her neutrality, politically and militarily, if not mentally. It is in mental neutrality that Mr. Mussert feels that his organization is necessary to Holland, for how can you be neutral, he asks, unless you are mentally also fifty percent for Germany and fifty percent for England?

* The race question is handled differently in the East Indies, the only part of the Netherlands Empire outside of Holland where an NSB organization exists. Here both pure Dutch and persons of mixed blood may belong to the Party, provided they feel themselves to be Netherlanders. end of *

Speaking of the Catholic Church, the leader pointed out that it was an organization with a strong leadership, and that it wished to be the only one so governed was the reason why it was anti-Nazi. He said that the United States had a stronger leadership now than Holland had, and had more freedom - indeed, too much. The Nazis feel that they do not have enough freedom in Holland, but the authorities feel that they must be supervised, ~~since some of their members have been convicted as spies, including two high~~

They also wonder whether Mussert may, ~~turn out~~ if circumstances permit, turn out to be a Quisling. But Mr. Mussert said to me, that "Quisling ~~is a failure~~ acted wrongly at first". The leader does not recognize that the Nazis inside Norway had any part in making easier the invasion of the Germans. He ~~blames~~ credits the easiness of the German success on the weakness which comes to countries which have democratic governments, and said the trouble with Norway was that it was a democracy with a weak army and navy, which was influenced by England. ~~And he scorns King Haakon and his government for fleeing his capital with the gold, just as did the rulers of Albania, Abyssinia, Czechoslovakia, and Poland.~~ [And he also scorns the Danes for not resisting, and blames that on the fact that the Danish government was controlled by Social Democrats and was therefore weak.]

Mr. Mussert did not explain his idea that Holland is not independent now, but he summed up his program in these words; " I am fighting so that when Germany wins, there will be ~~an independent Holland~~ a strong independent Dutch nation, with India. If England wins, then other people will have to decide, for I am finished".

FROM HOLLAND

Tomorrow is the opening day of the tulip season in Holland, and although it is an annual event, and this year the business is unusually bad, the people still enjoy looking at miles of level fields near Haarlem, checked in red, ~~lavender~~, yellow, and purple. ~~XXXXXXX~~ Their quiet Sunday will not be disturbed by the speech of their Prime Minister yesterday, for although it was unexpected, it was not caused by new international conditions, but was carefully timed for a ~~quiet~~ calm period so that it would not cause any disquiet, which is a Dutch principle. The reiteration of the fact that Holland would neither seek nor accept the protection of any other country was no surprise here, and the only thing that was new was an extension of martial law to cover the whole country, instead of parts of it, as before. This was mainly to help the authorities to deal with the possible dangers from within, which they are already watching carefully. As one official said to me proudly the other day: "We're catching spies like flies".

Under the decree declaring the state of siege, certain public political meetings have been curtailed. A meeting at Zutphen at which Mr. Mussert, leader of the Dutch National Socialist party was to have spoken on the subject "The End of Democracy, the Coming of the New Order" was forbidden by the Army. Another meeting was planned in Haarlem and 700 people were expected, but the police decided to move it from a large hall to a small private house, and to admit only members of the Party on presentation of the membership cards. In Limburg, near the German border, which has the highest percentage of Dutch Nazis, 16%, the house of a Nazi member of Parliament was searched for arms, ~~and also~~ as were the houses of other ~~members~~ Nazis, and although no weapons were found the search was considered important enough to make the two top right-hand columns of the morning paper yesterday. The next most important news relating to this country was of a ~~great~~ wind storm that blew down some houses and wrecked a few boats. But people here are so interested in European affairs, and they realize how closely ~~XXXXXXXX~~ their fate is bound up in them, that the first few pages of every paper are made up of ~~XXXXXXX~~ news stories from Sanddinavia

There was great interest here this week in the pronouncements of Japan and the United States about the Dutch East Indies. The Government here is not worried about them, and it has some time ago drafted a plan whereby, if Holland were invaded, the East Indies could go on running ~~itself~~ themselves independently, and would defend ~~itself~~ themselves against any possible attacks. The Netherlands headquarters of some of the big businesses ~~would~~ plan to move out to the Indies, and indeed a few of them have already done so. So again the Dutch people retain their usual calm, but after the Japanese Minister Arita's speech, the East Indian shares on the stock exchange here went down, and after Secretary Hull's speech, they went down still further. However, they do not fear that we will take any part of their colonial possessions, even if they should become involved in the difficulties of war.

Although these last few days have been quiet, people have not stopped their war preparations. A couple of days ago, when I went to a city hospital to have my fractured foot put into a plaster cast, the sweet-faced matron told me that half the hospital was run by the Red Cross, and was full of soldiers, who had all kinds of accidents and illnesses. The biggest hospital in Amsterdam is now half empty waiting for emergency cases.

A young business man took me to visit the Commodity Exchange, and afterwards I went down into the safe deposit vaults, which is considered bombproof, with him and his wife while they locked up a valuable paper — their wedding certificate! There were a lot of boxes, bags, hampers and trunks which the attendant said had been brought in during the last two weeks. * (see below) The business man told me a story which shows how active the shipping business is in Holland now: he said that a ship-broker he knew opened his desk one day and a mouse jumped out! It had not only eaten its way in, but had had time to build a nest and raise a family since the desk was last opened!

* I have even heard of Belgians who have brought their diamonds and valuable paintings to Holland during the scare last week.

The blacking out system in Amsterdam is going to be reorganized, New plans are being drawn up, and volunteers are being taught how to carry them out. Of course we dont have blackouts yet, and the streets are brightly lighted at night, and some of the highways too. Along one of these roads on a sunny afternoon I've just seen one of the first signs of spring - the local icecream man, in bright blue uniform with little wagon to match. ~~He gets a lot of business from Boy Scout, troops off on bicycle excursions, and from couples of some of the many 'bicycles built for two'.~~

The general outlook for this weekend in the Netherlands is far different from that of last weekend. Tomorrow we expect sunshine, icecream, and football, for there is a big soccer match on in the Olympic Stadium tomorrow afternoon between Holland and Belgium, and That is the biggest international problem that we have in sight at the moment.

13:22 - 13:28 (30) Dutch Time

FROM HOLLAND (This whole broadcast was banned on April 21, but given on April 28)

A new decree suspending the freedom of the press came into force in Holland yesterday, and it means in effect that the Army can suppress anything it wants to, at any time. This follows last week's decree declaring a state of siege throughout the Netherlands, and both measures are aimed chiefly at danger from within the country, and were probably hastened by the horrid example of Norway, which made people here shudder and redouble their vigilance.

I was interested to learn that there are about two thousand British residents in Holland, and about one hundred thousand Germans. And there are about seventy thousand Hollanders living in Germany now. These facts made the Dutch Government suspicious when they found that a number of uniforms of policemen, postmen, railroad and customs men, as well as soldiers, were being smuggled across the border into Germany. This was but one of several plans to destroy the neutrality of Holland, and the government and population is on edge and alert for possible treachery. Now the Army can, regardless of the loyalty of the police, search houses, suppress publications, and ban meetings, such as the annual May assembly of the National Socialistisch Beweging, or NSB, who are the most numerous Dutch Nazis. Their weekly newspaper, which is anti-English and anti-Jewish and has a circulation of some 40,000, was banned in the Hague yesterday afternoon, the first application of the new decree.

I dont think it's necessary to repeat to an American audience the principles of National Socialism, but ~~I think~~ it is interesting to know what the organization means to Holland now. Nazism is classed with communism in popular disfavor, and a law was passed several years ago forbidding membership in either group to all government officials and army officers. [~~Recently Belgium banned their newspapers.~~] Both organizations have lost members since the German-Russian pact last August, and the Communists are not regarded as a menace. The Nazi pledge of membership does not include any reference to Holland or to the Queen, and their sympathy with current German idealogy is what alarms the authorities. The Government and the Nazis watch each other carefully and both have instructed their representatives in America to listen to and report on this broadcast.

Personal feelings against the Nazis are bitter, because the great majority of people regard them as possible traitors. ~~A woman I know says she seldom sees her brother-in-law now, because he is an NSB and listens admiringly to the chief German radio propagandist.~~ ~~On the other side,~~ A Nazi official told me that all his friends were Nazis too, because no one else would associate with them. ~~He also said that National Socialists feel from the heart, -- that they fight for principles, not for money, and then said that his party is spending millions and millions of florins, mainly for headquarters, organization, and political propaganda.~~

The Dutch are a well-educated people politically, and they took warning early. Seeing the possible rise of the National Socialists as a dynamic danger to the present democratic government of Holland, the many, small democratic parties banded together in 1933 under the name of "Unity through Democracy" to work against fascism and communism, and they've organized lots of meetings with speakers from various parties, and they distribute leaflets and publish a weekly newspaper. They stand for the democratic form of government, civic freedom, Dutch law, and the establishment of an international world order.

Breckinridge CBS EAST INDIES DEFENCES #38 April 30,1940

FROM HOLLAND

11:11:10 - 11:15:30

All the flags are flying and bands are playing in Holland today, for this is Princess Juliana's Birthday. And yesterday was the 125th anniversary of the Order of William conferred for personal bravery in battle. Since Holland hasn't had a war in Europe since its foundation, the 200 members who were received by the Queen and held a banquet, won their distinction while fighting for the Netherlands Empire, which is 60 times larger than Holland.

The Dutch East Indies have been pretty well pacified since 1910, so the troops that are there now are meant to resist invasion. The Dutch were surprised by the announcement of the Japanese Foreign Minister a couple of weeks ago upholding the status quo of the Netherlands East Indies. They dont feel they need any help from Japan, thank you, and it was suggested to me that the only reason Japan brought up the subject (for they dont think she has any designs in that direction now) was to see what America would say. And Secretary Hull obliged by a prompt answer that was well received in Holland, if not in Japan, for there is absolutely no feeling here that America or Great Britain either, has any evil intentions on Dutch colonies, and Germany is in no position to attack the East Indies now. I was interested to learn from Government sources here that imports from Japan into the East Indies are slightly larger than from the United States, but the exports from the Indies to the States are more than three times as great as those to Japan.

In case Holland should be attacked, all plans have been completed so that the East Indies can govern and defend themselves independently of this country. Some big businesses have already moved out there, and others are prepared to go, so that Dutch business could carry on despite invasion. Already some American tobacco buyers have gone to the Indies last month to buy and ship directly from there instead of from Amsterdam as before the war.

The Royal Dutch Air Lines still run passenger and mail planes, but from Naples instead of Amsterdam, to the East Indies. Most of their eighty aerodromes and flying fields were shown on a map which I saw in the big Colonial Museum this afternoon, which is full of impressive displays of the commercial and artistic treasures of the colonies.

To understand the problems of their defence, I went this morning to interview General Feuilletau de Bruyn, who is in charge of the colonial armies here. He received me in a cosy office, with a photograph of ~~the~~ Queen Wilhelmina on the marble mantelpiece and a huge map of the East Indies on the wall, and he reminded me that it took ten days to sail from one end of them to the other. He served there for 25 years in the army which is under the Colonial Office, and was in command of it before returning to Holland. Now he wears its uniform of dark blue with red and gold collar and cuffs, and braid making Ws all over the front and sleeves, quite different from the grey-green of the army here which is under the War Office.

With the good humor of the Dutch 'militar', the General outlined the Indies defences to me like this: there is a standing army of 40,000, a fifth of whom are Hollanders, and it could be brought to 100,000 or more quite easily. They are financed by the colonial government, and are equipped with mountain, motor and field artillery and English Vickers tanks, and they use machine guns and anti-aircraft guns that are made in Sweden, in contrast to the army in Holland which uses German guns. The Air Force is much larger than that of Holland itself, and it includes 120 Glen Martin bombers, and within a few months they will have another hundred Curtis heavy pursuit planes and Dornier seaplanes, many of which are already delivered. With this equipment, infantry can be moved among the numerous islands very quickly, as there are eighty aerodromes and flying fields there.

The Navy is regarded as Imperial, instead of local, defence, and is directed and financed from Holland. However, the project for building three 26,000-ton battle cruisers for East Indian service came before the Council of the People in Batavia yesterday, and was passed without a dissenting vote after it passes the Parliament in the Hague. They will be built in Holland, and some of the materials, particularly metals, have already been ordered from Germany, since Holland cannot supply them all herself.

Three-quarters of the Dutch Navy is now in the Indies, and their number will be increased by some destroyers, light cruisers and submarines which are being built here now. There are two big naval bases on the most important island,

Java, ~~which has a population of forty millions and has the natural protection of dangerous reefs and few harbors.~~ From here it is ten days sailing to Japan, which is too far for a successful attack. Manila is only about five days away, but no one worries about that. In fact they dont really worry about the situation at all, for as General Feuilletau de Bruyn said to me today: "It would be a serious undertaking to make a landing in the Netherlands East Indies, but if anyone should try, we are ready".

Breckinridge CBS LAST VIEW OF HOLLAND #39 May ~~9~~ 10, 1940
from Paris Morning

This last period of tension in Holland seemed no more acute than the previous ones, and I've been through most of them for the past five months. I was there for the big scare of April 15th when army leaves were stopped, trains were commandeered for government use to bring people, cattle and machines from the threatened area, and there were army manoeuvres all night long in different parts of the country. Then the whole population felt uneasy and the restaurants and movie theatres were empty although it was Saturday night. Then when the Allies sent troops to Norway, and it was reported that Germany had removed several divisions from the Dutch border to send them northward, the situation relaxed. People in Holland thought that Sweden would be the next victim, followed by the Balkans, before Holland's turn came. Last week when the Germans seemed to have the Norwegian situation well in hand, Sweden lost its first place, but Hollanders thought that the Balkans would be next because they were weaker than Holland and Belgium who had over one million men already mobilized, and Germany always picked on weaker powers.

So on Tuesday, when I returned from an all-day patrol trip on the North Sea in the Biggest Dutch cruiser in home waters and saw the newspaper headlines saying that all leaves were cancelled, and later in the evening found international telephone lines temporarily reserved for the Netherlands Government, it seemed to be just a repetition of previous scares, and people thought it might have been caused by fear of treachery from within, or a rumoured threat from official German circles to Holland in order to cover a big, quick, German move toward the Balkans.

So when I left Holland on Wednesday, I, and almost everyone else did not realize this was the last period of tension and the beginning of war.

REFUGEES FROM PARIS

Four thousand Refugees from ~~the~~ new war areas, mostly from Belgium and some from northern France, ~~which are really the old war areas,~~ ~~are~~ poured into Paris ~~if the thousands.~~ yesterday and I went to the station to meet them ~~Yesterday I went to the station to meet the trains. The place was strangely quiet, though full of people: soldiers with packs and helmets going back to the Front after leave, and people waiting to see if their friends would be among the refugees.~~ They poured off the train, with suitcases, knapsacks and carpetbags, and even their housewives' market bags full of their little treasures; they pushed baby carriages full of quilts, and bicycles with bags and boxes tied all over them with bits of string. One little girl carried a black cat, and several families brought their dogs with them. Boy Scouts pushed loaded baggage trucks ~~with~~ and one had a sick child on top of a lot of sacks. Girl Scouts acted as guides, gave their arms to old people, and carried their parcels for them. A wounded French soldier was pushed by in a wheel chair, with his foot heavily bandaged.

A little group of two simply dressed women in deep mourning and a half-grown boy carrying an enormous wreath were ~~looking for~~ trying to meet something, but I dont know if they found it. ——

~~In the covered taxi yard, besides the waiting lines for soldiers, were drawn up some trucks for trains coming the rain~~

They ~~now arrived~~ were taken to the luggage room, where they gave their former addresses, and then sat down to ~~their gasmasks beside them~~ bowls ~~bowls~~ of hot coffee ~~and~~ or soup and hunks of bread supplied by volunteer women in white uniforms ~~and veils~~ with veils. They ate off the curving luggage tables which I had last seen covered with the smart baggage of my gay fellow-passengers of the Nieuw Amsterdam last August. Now the travelers are tired, and each trainload looks more tired, ~~the train~~ One girl of twelve, ~~who is looking after~~ with her three brothers and sisters, who are without their parents, said they were nine hours late because of air attacks on their train, though they were not hit. She said they had not slept since the war began, for they, like many others, had walked a long distance before getting on the train, and at night they were kept awake by air raids. Two men told me that they were with about twenty other refugees outside the station at Chalons when they were machine-gunned by enemy aiplanes so they all threw themselves down in the gutter, and ~~no one was hurt~~ escaped injury.

On another ~~big~~ baggage table, a French mother was changing her two-month-old baby, while three other children stood around with solemn, listless faces, not saying a word.
Their father was a soldier at the Front, and they came from near ~~Strasbourg, in France.~~ the French border

I asked the ~~[illegible]~~ eldest if they had started bombing there. "Oh, yes!" said she, but she didn't want to talk about it any more.

~~In the covered taxi-yard outside, beside the new dormitories for soldiers,~~ Outside, trucks were drawn up ~~[illegible]~~ for transporting the refugees to temporary quarters, and ambulances for those who were ill or wounded. Those four were given by Friends of France in Haiti, Cuba, Chili and Argentina, and they were driven by French women volunteers in ~~[illegible]~~ snappy blue uniforms, members of the Union des Femmes de France. One of them told me she had met a train earlier in the morning that had been machine-gunned, and a few passengers were wounded, others were killed.

A red-haired young Belgian, ~~who will go home to fight as soon as he can get there, has been asked by his Embassy to help ~~[illegible]~~ take care of refugees in the meantime, so he collected some new arrivals, saw that they were registered and had ~~[illegible]~~ some food, and then~~ appointed by his Embassy, marshalled some new arrivals them into a meat truck: a white-haired old couple, each with a red blanket roll over his shoulder; two little fair-haired sisters with their ~~[illegible]~~ fat, white dog; a woman with two schoolboys in their black pinafores ~~aprons~~; one boy of seventeen, who told me ~~[illegible]~~ that when he heard that the Germans were ten kilometres away from his village, he simply ran, without even being able to find his mother to say goodbye. These and a number of others sat in wooden chairs put in the meat truck, and I followed them out to their new residence.

This was an ~~[illegible]~~ old ladies' home which is run by nuns on the outskirts of Paris, and it is only 150 yards from an anti-aircraft battery. The large, old stone buildings surround a big yard, with a field and vegetable gardens. Other refugees were already there, basking in the sun. They lined up willingly for a photograph ~~[illegible]~~, and just as the photographer was focussing, there was a tremendous howling of sirens, which meant a new air raid. One little boy said "We must lie down", but he didn't move, and no one stirred until after the picture was taken, although they knew more about bombs than anyone in Paris does yet. Then each mother grabbed her toddler tightly by the hand, and we followed the white-capped sister across the garden and into the cellar of an old tower. We sat on backless benches in the semi-darkness , but only one little girl cried. The other children got rather uneasy, especially when an 11-year-old boy was carried in by one of the old men. He was an idiot, and has never walked or spoken, but he understands some things, and when he hears the air raid alarm, he squeals in terror.

The Belgian organizer ~~XXXXXXXXXXXXXXX~~ called for order and started to tell a ghost story, about a ghost that scared him one night by tap-tapping all over the room, and it turned out in the end it was only a cockroach with a wooden leg. This story brought delighted laughter from all the children, and quiet gratitude from the women for his efforts. Then, under the light of the single, weak bulb, he made faces like Benito and Adolf, and told a couple of funny stories about them which passed the time until the all clear ~~XXXXXX~~. sounded. This was the only time I heard Hitler mentioned all day, and when refugees speak of Germans, it is usually as "they" - They were coming, they bombed, they begin it again, as the old people remember.

?? Back in the station, bigger crowds were gathered to greet the refugees, One woman, who arrived alone and looked less tired than the rest, was questioned by a little group of people: "What happened to my town? Was my home bombed? ~~Have you heard about my village?~~" Patiently she repeated that she did not know, there was no news. Anxious friends, ~~a widow with tears on her cheek~~, waited in the station for train after train, all late, and when their people didnot arrive, they'dsay to each other: There's another train in half an hour. There's another train in half an hour.

DEFENSE PASSIVE

FROM PARIS

As we drink our coffee and eat our ~~crescents~~ rolls in the morning here in Paris, we hear following the radio news, instructions saying 'If you think you've been gassed, lie down and wait for help', 'Put names and addresses on your children, so that if they are lost in a refuge they can be promptly returned' which is a polite explanation for the need to identify little bodies. These are part of the latest rules for air raid behaviour, and others are that it is forbidden to walk in the streets, to look out of windows, or to sit on cafe terraces, which show with what calm curiosity Parisians take their alertes, so far. And all outdoor public meetings, such as horse races, are forbidden until further notice.

Each day brings news of bombings of French towns, and this method of warfare may some day be tried on the Capital, and may even include gas attacks. ~~Since the beginning of the war there has been the nightly blackout, many shop windows have been taped to prevent shattering, parts of the subways that were outdoors were closed, some children, maternity hospitals and a few old people were evacuated, as were also several thousand works of art from museums, and several hundreds from churches.~~ The basements of 21 borough halls, 55 schools and numerous other public buildings including two prisons have been renovated for Passive Defense purposes, and they are studying many more such projects. They have also dug about three miles of trenches, and have envelopped outdoor manuments and works of art in 175,00 sandbags containing 5,000 square yards of sand - and these are the neatest sandbags, by the way, some of them with corrugated tin roofs to protect them.

People have been supplied with gasmasks, and there are special gas-proof cradles for babies. ~~A few days ago I visited one of four laboratories on wheels, completely equipped to determine the nature of the gas, which is of vital importance in determining protection and treatment of gas cases.~~ The French are ready for this, as I can assume you often having carefully inspected their system.

In case of bombing or other explosion, a squad of special little cars each containing two men in heavy, ~~hot~~ black rubber suits, with helmets and gasmasks, rush around to the scene, yank out a square metal box about the size of a victrola, which is a machine 'detector', and light a flame in it; if the blue flame becomes yellow, it is surely gas.

Then a sample of the gas is taken to one of the four laboratories on wheels, which I visited the other day. It is completely equipped to determine the nature of the gas, which is of vital importance in protecting and treating patients. The quick, little Frenchman in charge said that he and his three co-workers could tell which of the many known gasses it was in three to four minutes. If it was an unknown gas, it would be sent to a big central laboratory, where he said they could discover and repeat it in less than three days.

After the gas attack, teams of two sprinklers each, under the Street Cleaning department, go about clearing gas off the streets by spraying them and the fronts of the buildings with lime. They also use special set of apparatus and tools, such as scoops for incendiary bombs. There are only about 100 of these men now, always ready for work, but there were 1300 at the beginning of the war andthere could be 2000 on short notice. They are taught to use slow, rythmic gestures, so that they wont be exhausted by waste motion in their heavy, hot clothes. After being near gas, they have to be taken off by a special undresser wearing gasproof gloves.

When people are gassed, they are taken to one of the 31 First Aid Posts, and sent on stretchers hanging on pulleys, down the steep stairs with gasproof doors on each end, into the basement. There a doctor takes a quick look and sends them to the right ward: one for the asphyxiated, where there are oxygen masks for ten patients at a time; one for the suffocated, one for the sufferers from mustard gas, and one for the wounded. The mustard gas is much the most serious, and must be kept quite separate. In the extensive Post that I saw, under a borough hall, they needed more room so they reconditioned part of the old Paris sewer. So now the Post has 200 beds, and could take 300. It also has a complete operating room, and its fittings, as well as the things in the rest of the Post, were all made by the part-time orderlies who belong to the various trades, and used the materials at hand. There are also trained and volunteer nurses on the staff. The whole place is whitewashed and clean, and it has a reservoir of water sufficient for 24 hours of capacity use, and a special ventilating system to bring in only purified air from outside. In case the electric motor should stop, there are two bicycles fitted to operate the system by foot.

For moving patients, there are ambulances with trailers attached which can take 60 to 70 patients at a time.

The most important emergency arrangements are found in the basement of the Hotel de Ville, the City Hall. Here a large, bombproof shelter has been constructed, with tremendous doors two inches thick. I wandered through room after room, divided by concrete walls, each room with apparatus necessary to carry on electricity, gas, telephone and other public services for all the municipal offices and emergency stations. A crew of skilled operators work in this artificial security to maintain the service of passive defence.

SHOPPING AND ALERTE #42

no. 42

3:35 A.M.

Although the spirit in Paris is tense, ~~A tremendous battle is being fought about a hundred miles away, and the situation is described as 'very grave', but~~ even that didn't stop Frenchwomen from going shopping on Saturday afternoon. The stores here have beautiful things in the windows, with a lot of variety, and you can buy them without restrictions. It's true that in the big dressmaking houses, no one has the heart, or maybe confidence, to order new clothes, but I noticed at Lanvin's yesterday that the fitting rooms are still humming busily with French words in American accents coming over the partitions.

~~The boulevards near the big department stores are crowded with people - mostly women of course, because the men have other work to do these days.~~

The small expensive shops are practically empty because the tourist has vanished and the French person doesn't go in for luxuries any more, but there are still things of taste and quality to be found everywhere. ~~[And the food is still excellent and plentiful, in spite of the restrictions on certain days of the week. The only time I've noticed these restrictions was when I went into Rumpelmayer's on a no-pastry day, and found the long table which is usually ornamented with rows of cakes had nothing on it but a couple of sandwiches and a glorified rice pudding.]~~

But the ordinary Frenchwoman goes for clothes and household things, or maybe for distraction, to the several big department stores. The boulevards near them were crowded with people - mostly women of course, because the men have other work to do these days. The shoppers didn't look gay or carefree, but they were keeping busy and getting what fun they could out of silk stockings, new hats, and perfumed soap. And some of them went to the Hygienic Department to buy gas masks. ~~In the Galeries Lafayette which was full of customers.~~

Just after I left the store and was walking beside the Opera, the air raid sirens sounded. The masses of people on the sidewalks walked calmly to shelters in stores or the subway, because a new law last week forbids one to walk in the street or to sit on a cafe terrace during an alert. ~~I followed a boat twenty~~

I went into an office building with a sign saying 'Shelter' on it. The janitor's wife in a blue apron got her key to the cellar and led the way down two flights of steps into a stone room where special reinforcements in wood and cement made a good protection. A couple of boards were used as benches, covered with travel posters advertising Poland which have no other use now, and I sat beside a white-haired old lady with a calm, sad face and folded hands. The hands began working nervously as we heard thud after thud every few seconds outside. Remember that France knows she is in a grave situation, and would not be astonished if Paris were attacked with real bombs any minute, and maybe gas, and none of us had masks with us, and you will know what the twenty people in that cellar were thinking.

But there was no sign of nervousness or dismay. There was a stenographer who had come straight from the store with her bundles, a workman in blue overalls and slippers, a neat little businessman reading his newspaper, and some other men and women who started talking and laughing together. One of the men said that the repeated thumps were made by two anti-aircraft guns on top of the Galeries Lafayette, andhe must have been at least half right because the official communique said this evening that 16 German planes had passed over Paris and four had been brought down, three by the anti-aircraft guns and one by a pursuit plane. People think here that the German flights over Paris are just meant to interrupt and alarm people, and although this interrupted their activities, it did not in the least alarm them. As soon as the All Clear sounded, we all left the shelter and less than one minute later the crowds were back on the streets, sitting on cafe terraces and ordering coffee and beer, and the women were fingering the bolts of silk on the outdoor bargain counters. The hand bag display of one whole window was thrown to the ground, probably by the vibration caused by the firing, but as far as I could see that was the only damage, either material or moral, that was done. Despite air raids and a vitally important battle, Parisians are still shopping.

I take you now to London.

FROM PARIS

The Paris railway stations are still full of unhappy travellers, coming and going. [~~[illegible]~~] The ~~[illegible]~~ number of refugees is so large that it is not announced, although it is known. From my observation it is now many thousands each day, and always increasing. [~~[illegible]~~] Although these refugees, who cant keep up with the news, feel safe here, it is not considered the best place for any women and children just now. Twenty-five thousand children with their teachers have been evacuated by the government within the last three days, in addition to those who were evacuated last September and are still in safer areas. Now the people who can afford to take themselves are going, and I saw in the Place de la Concorde a ~~smartly-dressed~~ chic-looking woman in a sporty car with piles of luggage on top, and two children and the governess behind among various household goods. The roads to the south and west have many cars like this. (+) ~~[illegible]~~ (1)

~~Tonight~~ Last night I went down to the Gare Montparnasse to see hordes of people leaving for points away from this 'war of motion', as it is called now. ~~A nice looking [illegible] mother with a small boy and a baby and the maid were unloading suitcases and bedding rolls from their taxi, and another woman had found a porter's truck [illegible] but no porter, so she was wheeling it herself, laden with her [illegible] handsome bags. A well dressed young widow with her three year-old little daughter were going to stay with her parents in the country.~~

~~As a contrast to these neat people who knew where they were going and were paying their way, were the much more~~ Among them many from Northern France numerous refugees. You could tell them easily because they ~~[illegible]~~ were dirty and weary, and looked as if their feet hurt. One woman, ~~who was wearing [illegible] felt slippers, told me she had walked a long distance before getting a ride in a truck, and when I asked how she could do it in slippers,~~ ~~she~~ said she had ~~[illegible]~~ walked ~~[illegible]~~ exhausted her feet bled, and she showed me they were both completely bandaged, ~~inside the new slippers.~~ ~~Her elderly husband was village constable, and they left the village quickly when they heard that the Germans were coming, because they feared that the son would be sent to a concentration camp, as was done in Poland.~~ ~~This~~ Her family was one of a column of refugees who were walking along the highway when they were attacked by planes with machine guns. Now they are on their way west with the special railway passes which have been issued to refugees, but they dont know where they are going.

The large buffet was crowded with people being fed for nothing by volunteer workers, and Boy Scouts helped them carry bundles and guided them about. All around the waiting rooms, the baggage rooms and the main platforms were piles of bedding tied up with string, and sacks of clothes, with children parked on top munching bread. Most parcles had a knapsack with a loaf of bread and a bottle of red wine sticking out of it. One bottle broke when it fell from the pocket of a white-mustached peasant from the north, in his brown velveteen suit, as he stooped to lift his heavy sack to his shoulders again, but people were too busy trying to keep track of their ~~baggage~~ belongings and children to pay any attention. (3) A little girl was dragged by, too tired to notice that her doll was hanging upside down. In a corner near the newsstand an old woman was sitting on her pile of clothes and trying to write a letter on a piece of lined paper with stiff old hands. But they all know it will be a long time before their families hear from them, and before they know which of their families have survived.

I talked to a little girl of ten with dark circles under her eyes who was waiting for her mother, and she told me she was on a train which was machine-gunned, leaving one person dead and several wounded, and later the train was derailed as a result of bombing. 'Oh, we've certainly seen things' she said with a sad, old air. Then her mother came back and she ~~they~~ picked up her bundles and her little puppy andthey went off.

For people like that, Paris seems safe, but they must move on where they are sent, and they are being joined voluntarily by Parisians seeking a healthier ~~climate~~ atmosphere than our beautiful May sunshine may bring.

I ~~return~~ take you now to ~~Columbia, New York~~ London

(1) All foreigners who want to leave Paris, or who want to move more than three miles away from their residence outside, must have a special permit which takes from three to ten days to get. This is one of the precautions that France takes to guard herself against danger from the one million foreigners within her borders.

The wives and children of American Embassy and Consular officials have been ordered out of Paris, and sent to St. Jean de Luz or to the Bordeaux region ready for quick shipment home if it should be necessary.

(2) This is the station for some of France's seaports, and sailors were going back from leave. One of them was sitting near me on his dufflebag and eating his supper of sardines out of a tan, while an officer was seeing his white-gloved little boy onto the evacuation train.

? (3) He had bicycled as far as Amiens with five members of his family, and then come on by train. His wife told me they were going to Marly, and asked kindly where I was going ---

FROM PARIS

The official communique issued this morning says that in spite of numerous engagements during the night there is no change in the situation, which remains confused between the regions of the Somme River and Cambrai. Enemy attacks were repulsed at various points notably near the Aisne and in the region of Rethel. French aviation continued its intense bombardment behind enemy lines. That ends the communique.

Today is the first time that it has been announced that the Germans have been dropping parachutists in large numbers behind the French lines, to try to control bridges and stations.

From the North Sea to Cambrai the Allies are still retreating in good order, and east of Cambrai there is very hard fighting. Between Cambrai and Peronne there is terrific confusion, and the big German push is continuing in a northwesterly direction. Now they are pushing on, not with heavy tanks, but with motorcyclists, small armoured cars and light infantry carried in trucks, all moving very fast. The French announce that Laon has not been taken.

The Germans continue their dive-bombing tactics on aerodromes and stations; the French bombers are concentrating on the enemy's immediate rear, and have blown up groups of transportation trucks and tanks by this method. The British bombers are concentrating on the Rhine region. French military authorities say that the German losses compared to the Allies' are even more than three to one.

On the Swiss border, although Germany may have withdrawn two or three divisions, the great mass of German reserves remains, and are regarded as a menace.

FRENCH WOMEN - WAR WORK

This is the first war in which women have ever been militarized in France. Now there are three groups affiliated with the Red Cross, who are attached to the ~~1st~~ 21-regiment train des Equipages of the Army, and they get their orders both from the Army and from the Red Cross. They are practically all volunteers, ~~and~~ and must take courses in simple mechanics and first aid. They live at home when working in the Paris district, and ~~and the discipline is not as strict as in the British women's auxiliary forces.~~ A good half of them are married, and of course most of the husbands are in the Army. ~~I asked the Director of one of these Automobile Sections that the French men thought of this activity on the part of their wives, so cloistered women, and he said they had rather objected at first, but now they realize that everyone must serve France, and these women drivers are extremely useful, so they [illegible] are being won over.~~

~~XXXXXXXXXXXX~~ Today is the last day on which the refugees from the north will come through Paris, and after this they will be routed around the city to safer areas. The transportation and care of these refugees is handled by these women drivers ~~XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX~~. Yesterday the Union des Femmes de France, under the Red Cross, sent several teams of trained nurses and trucks with supplies to start First Aid stations on the roads from the north, to care for refugees, give them information and to dress their injuries. ~~[illegible]~~ Both last Tuesday they took over a large private house, which they have equipped with beds and mattresses from their supply for their peacetime hospital work, and every night they receive about a hundred refugees who are sent on to other parts of France in the morning. This is staffed entirely by volunteer work of French ladies, many of them elderly. When I went there yesterday, one of them helped me to find the Acting President of the whole ~~large~~ organization ~~of the Union of French Women.~~ We discovered her in the back courtyard, among the supplies which were being donated every few minutes by Parisians ~~people who had read about the work~~ and piles of boxes from the tall, distinguished-looking lady in black with a white choker was helping a young servant girl in a blue apron to carry an enormous cardboard box full of medical supplies ~~[illegible] sent from America~~

~~and [illegible] they were almost help. They have another reception centre, which used to be a home for soldiers on leave, but now there are very few soldiers on leave, and the most pressing need is still for the evacuated~~.

Besides taking ~~these people~~ refugees to and from the Paris stations, and running free buffets to feed them, and a dormitory to house over ~~XX~~ 400 in the Gare de l'Est, which has 100 fulltime workers and many part-time ~~[illegible]~~ helpers, the Automobile Section also carries out orders outside of Paris, ~~picking up refugees off the roads~~. One woman driver was in a cellar with twelve injured children she was transporting in an ambulance during an air raid, when the house was hit and fell on them, but she and most of the children were dug out alive. The women may wear regular soldiers helmets near the front, for they are often under fire though never on the very first line. Yesterday they went to fetch the nurses from the hospitals at Compiègne which were closed. And on Friday they ~~are~~ will be sending to the Front a full section of twenty ambulances, each with driver and helper, a truck for supplies, and a rolling kitchen, and the section is accompanied by a car with a French Army Lieutenant and a couple of skilled mechanics for serious repairs. Those ambulances belong to the French Army, but for other necessary transportation work ~~XXXXXX~~ they ~~can~~ use their own ambulances, and I saw at the Gare du Nord the other day four which had been given by Friends of France in Chili, Haiti, Argentina and Mexico. ~~They are referred to~~ by their places, and ~~last night XXXXXX~~ I was sitting in the office of the director of the Automobile Section on the Champs-Elysees when the drivers came in one by one to report on their day's work, or get orders for the night's work. The director told one of them: "You take Mexico, and fetch a dozen invalid children evacuated from a sanatorium in the north, now at the Gare du Nord, and take them to our overnight refuge on the Boulevard Malesharbes".

Before this big push, which has brought more work and many more volunteers, they organized a service called "Le Colis du Combattant" which sent packages of sweets, clothes and books ~~XX~~ addressed by name to men who according to their officers never got any mail, ~~according to their officers~~, which is rather typical of the French thought for the individual.

~~At the same time that this section was mobilized, during the last days of August last year, another organization, the Section Automobile Feminin Francais, was started, in addition to the Societe de Secours aux Blesses Militaires, and all three have a cordinating committee under the Red Cross.~~

These two, with

The S.A.F.F., ~~as they are called,~~ have been transporting almost 4000 refugees a day in ~~have~~ 150 private cars with drivers, ~~XXXXXX~~ and a few trucks, ~~enough~~ They haven't nearly enough. ~~They have been transporting almost 4000 refugees a day during this last week, as an old woman arrived XXXX in Paris with nothing but a red cotton handkerchief of her belongings, and two goats.~~

They also transport Red Cross packages, and drive officials from the ministries, and carry urgent messages for the Army, ~~like three drivers who left at four o'clock yesterday morning for the front under army orders.~~ Their public chief told me that the membership has just about doubled since the war started in earnest, ~~and [illegible] they [illegible] them. They must take short courses in simple mechanics and first aid.~~ and As I left the office, the anteroom was filled with the unusual type of well-dressed young women, ~~XXXXXXXX~~ coming to offer their services as drivers for France.

THE REFUGEE PROBLEM FROM PARIS

no. 45
May 23, 1940
3:46 A.M.

No more news from the Front has reached us in Paris since the last Columbia broadcast.

Tonight the French radio announced, after the news, that from now on no French radio stations would broadcast anything but the official news bulletin and notices, with the exception of Radio Paris, that cuts out all their entertainment programs.

It was also announced that on the French radio M. Camille Chautemps, the Vice-President of the Cabinet, who is in charge of the refugee problem, has opened an information bureau for French refugees, to try to help them findtheir families. This is a difficult task, as there are ~~now~~ five million ~~OF THEM IN FRANCE~~ people, mostly women and children, from northern France, Belgium and Luxemburg, now wandering about this country, and many have become separated from their children and friends in the rush.

Lots of refugees come by train, but ~~this~~ is ~~not very safe because the stations and tracks are often bombed~~. ~~This happened at Cambrai last week when the platforms were crowded with people waiting for the train, and forty or fifty of them were killed, and many others wounded.~~ The ones who come on foot ~~ALSO FACE DANGER~~ may have to face machine gun fire, and surely fatigue, and so Paris busses and ambulances and trucks driven by women volunteers are being sent out to meet them and give them a lift. ~~The St. John Ambulance Brigade has been moving the nuns out of the northwestern part of the country.~~ Some ~~MANY~~ of the evacuated people have their own cars, and the government has put up special signs to route them off the main roads, and it provides them with gasoline without ~~THE~~ having to present ration cards. A Frenchwoman told me over coffee after lunch today that she had driven back to Paris yesterday from the west after taking her family to the country, and had passed kilometres and kilometres of refugees. She saw one private automobile, riddled with machinegun bullets, stop, and the driver, who looked half crazy, got out and opened the back door to help his wife and three children out, ~~and~~ suddenly found they were all dead.

A village ~~in~~ northern France which has a 1200 bed hospital, admitted 3200 patients, all wounded refugees, between last Friday and Sunday, and many of them were hopeless cases.

To look after five million people is a tremendous job, and the French ~~and Belgian~~ Red Cross, associated with the military authorities, have established outposts on the non-military roads from the north. There they give out food and care for the wounded, and find out where the people come from. On the basis of their locality, they are given an assembly point which they should try to reach. From these points they are re-routed through newly-established railroad centers, to their final destinations. This roundabout method has been devised to prevent the people from crowding on Paris, whose stations and dormitories have been jammed these last ten days. It is also thought wiser to keep the roads near Paris free for military use, so two days ago a barrage was established around the city and refugees were sent in other directions.

Those who had their own cars and some money went to southern France and rented the empty houses so there is less space left for the others who follow on foot or bicycle. Actually the refugees can be found throughout the whole district from the Swiss and Italian borders (the possibilities here seem as nothing compared to what they left) to the coast on the west. Near Dieppe 5000 of them are living in deep caves burrowed into the cliffs, and a town of 4000 inhabitants nearby has now over 800 refugees. Some are in empty summer cottages, and a lot of others sleep on mattresses on the floor of the Casino.

Since these refugees cannot leave France, it is up to France to support them. Each department has a refugee headquarters under the Prefect, and each village has one under the Mayor. He gets the townspeople to help, and to give what they can, and contributes whatever he can from the local treasury. A sample meal from a town I know consisted of soup, lentils, bread, and rice pudding. Even with careful management, these new mouths cost the country one million dollars a day to feed, and of course they will be fed as long as the supplies last. So far, food has been plentiful and good in France, but this new influx may drain its resources. If you imagine that it would take the total load of five cargo ships to feed the refugees for one day, and that it would take a fleet of 210 ships in constant service to carry enough food, you will get an idea of the problem.

Some of the refugees have money, but the Belgians, of course, had only their own money which is now of doubtful value. However, the French have agreed to exchange it at the rate of 143 French francs to 100 Belgian francs, but each person is allowed to exchange only 2000 francs a fortnight, or, if he is the head of a family, 5000 francs. But the vast majority are penniless, and a large number have inadequate clothes and no bedding.

The Paris newspapers have special columns devoted to refugee problems now, with appeals for shoes, woolen clothing, pillowcases, jam, and all kinds of supplies, from the various agencies mostly under the French or Belgian Red Cross, who are running centers and dormitories. The Automobile Sections also appeal for trucks to transport the people and supplies.

The American Red Cross is playing an active part in helping these refugees, and it has established a new headqurters in Paris under the direction of Mayne Chatfield Taylor, It cooperates with the French and Belgian Red Cross, and other national French and American organizations, to whom it has already allotted a quarter of a million dollars, Mr. Taylor told me this afternoon that it has been decided to open another office in Bordeaux, to be staffed by trained personnel who are now flying over on the Clipper, and its job will be to receive shipments from the United States and to act as a distributing point for supplies. The first shipload of clothing and other supplies will leave America for Bordeaux on Saturday. The Red Cross is also sending over a million dollars worth of hospital supplies for the use of the French and Belgian Red Cross. In all this work, the American Embassy in Paris is giving close cooperation.

The pressing need of these millions of wanderers is first aid, food and shelter; then comes work. Because part of the industrial area of northern France has been evacuated, there are a lot of workmen who had not been mobilized, and they are offered jobs, by radio and newspaper publicity, especially in national defence industries, and in agriculture which has suffered seriously from the mobilization of the farmers. Tomorrow the refugees start working the fields in the west, but they are mostly old men. The country also offers jobs to factory managers, foremen, masons, carpenters, and other skilled workmen.

These workers will be a help to this country, but the great majority of the five million are women, children, and old people who cannot work, yet must, by all humanitarian standards be fed and lodged, with their homes bombed, family ties broken, nothing for them to do, and no resources, this fleeing army of non-combattants is to France one more burden of war.

FROM PARIS

On the outskirts of Paris today a roadside canteen fed 1000 refugees ~~with bread, sausages, cheese, chocolate and lemonade,~~ before they were shunted around the city and sent to outlying districts. This was done by the Comité Américain de Secours Civil, or, as it is often referred to, Ann Morgan's organization. During and After the last war she was the leading force in social service work in the devastated regions of the Aisne, and ~~the people around~~ Blerancourt ~~still remember her now that she is back again.~~ she was driven out of by the Germans in 1918 and again last week in 1940

The purpose of the new organization is to take care of the evacuation of French civilians from the districts in northern Ardenne and Alsace, in cooperation with the military authorities, and to set up new centers to look after the same people in southwestern France. ~~The evacuation of the district seemed to Miss Morgan inevitable at some time, so last October the American Committee started social service and health work near the Belgian border at Givet, while other centers were functioning in Alsace and in the south.~~ On the day that Germany entered Holland and Belgium, some 20 -odd workers of the Committee, including Miss Morgan, rushed to Givet near the Belgian border, where social service and health work had been established since last October. They met there at midnight, woke up the 5000 inhabitants, piled as many as possible into their own trucks, into ambulances driven by women attached to the French Red Cross, and others driven by American volunteers under the American Legion, and into French Army trucks which were being driven down in order to bring up more munitions. This fleet covered a narrow mountain road often under bombardment, to take the refugees to the train, as the nearest railway station had been destroyed. They promised to go back for the rest of the population, but they couldn't because the Germans got there first, and have held it ever since.

For six days and nights - except for about two hours sleep each night - the Committee ran the evacuation of villages and towns in that region, working till the last moment, and leaving only when the Germans were reported a few hours behind, and once only seven kilometres away.

~~They took the refugees to centers where they were given food and first aid and loaded into trains, but sometimes the trains couldn't move because the tracks had been bombed ahead of them.~~ At a strategic point for evacuating people, one ~~town~~ the canteen was machine gunned repeatedly, so the workers and refugees had to spend a couple of hours sitting in the woods.

~~At Tagnon~~ In a town, south of the Aisne, a French trained nurse who is also Section Chief on the Committee, set up a refugee center for thousands of transients, found barns to lodge them, bandaged their feet, and was invested with full powers by the Mayor to run everything. She told me she did more than 100 dressings of machine-gun wounds in one morning. The town suffered terrible bombing one night, and two women were killed. She picked them up, but there was no time to bury them because the Germans were coming and they had to evacuate the town.

~~This nurse ran from Germans~~, the crew of a plane that had been shot down, landing by parachute. Two were found, one dead and one badly wounded, so she dressed the wound and sent him ~~to~~ a hospital. He was wearing the uniform of the Royal Air Force. They spoke in German, and she reproached him for machinegunning women ~~and children. He first answered 'This is war', and later said 'Let me be'~~.

The refugees were eventually taken to certain specified districts in the ~~XXXX~~ southwest, where they were given ~~supplies~~, clothing, ~~diapers~~, food and social service care. As transportation is difficult in wartime, the supplies were mainly bought in France with money raised by the Committee in America, ~~whose headquarters are in Miss Morgan's house in New York, and they have been a long contribution in the last ten days. as it is easier than transporting materials in wartime~~.

As I went in to see Miss Morgan in the Paris headquarters this morning I ~~went by piles of~~ passed 6000 blankets piled in the front hall, and saw some of the girls in their khaki uniforms and berets coming in for orders. The idea is to engage French women as social service workers and nurses, and to use American women volunteers as drivers, and they could use more of the right type, if they could get themselves to France. Miss Morgan was in the hall, talking with a man who was Section Chief of the American ambulance corps, about four ~~XXXX~~ men with ~~cars~~ ambulances that had disappeared while cooperating on evacuation work; they are thought to be either killed or captured. Miss Morgan keeps her finger on everything, motors up to the front to oversee evacuation under bombs, down to the quiet areas to inspect canteens and health centers, and back to Paris for government permissions and administrative work. She told me that she and her associate from the last war, Rose Dolan, had been received by Marshal Petain recently, who congratulated them on their work for the civilians of France, and promised his full support.

NEWS FROM PARIS #47 today

There is important news ~~this morning~~; The Premier of France, Mr. Paul Reynaud, made a speech on the radio at eight thirty; (Paris time) In it he announded that France could no longer count on the support of the Belgian Army since four o clock ~~this today~~ this morning. The Belgian decision was made by King Leopold himself, without consulting either the French or British Governments, and it was taken against the ~~XXXXXX~~ unanimous wishes of his responsible ministers, ~~XXXXXXXXXXXXXXX~~ as announced by the Belgian Government representatives in Paris;

This leaves the entire British Expeditionary Force and several French divisions (~~which I m told means about XXXX 750,000 men~~) commanded by General Blanchard, cut off in Belgium. Their sole source of supplies ~~of~~ is Dunkerque. ~~XXXXXX~~ The British and French armies have been defending the front on the south and west; the Belgians on the north; It is this Belgian Army which has unconditionally capitulated, in open country, at the order of its king, without informing its French and British comrades; thus leaving the way to Dunkerque open to the German divisions;

One feels in Monsieur Reynaud's speech a sense of disappointment and ~~XX~~ disillusionment that a King who had called France to help his country ~~XX~~ eighteen days ago should give up suddenly without telling the men who tried to come to its aid --- and he calls it "unprecendented in history." ~~XX~~ The Premier concludes by speaking admiringly of the way in which the French army has fought. ~~XXXXXXXXXXXXXX

~~Forced by the Allies, is to be avoided;~~

The Belgian Cabinet is holding another meeting this morning, and its Premier, ~~and its Premier,~~ Monsieur Pierlot ~~M. Hubert Pierlot, is scheduled to make a radio speech afterwards;~~ was scheduled to make a radio speech at 12:30 today.

~~THE~~ French, British and American reporters crowded into the War Ministry an hour ago. Here is what they were told by a French Staff Officer: "One man must bear the responsibility. This capitulation was not the will of the Belgian Army itself; It has changed the face of the war in the North." They were told that the Belgian Army even yesterday was holding out very well, and up to ~~five~~ four o clock this morning when the capitulation was ordered, the Belgians seemed to be holding their positions; According to the War Ministry, the Belgians stopped fighting at the very moment when they were most needed, when the French and British were making real progress at Aire sur la Lys. The Belgians had been holding the Front from Gand to Menen. Numerically what does this loss mean to the Allied cause? As near as we can estimate it means perhaps a quarter of a million troops, about eighteen divisions, It also means some of the fortresses in eastern Belgium that were still holding out. It is admitted in Paris that the Belgians have suffered terrific losses . As to the rest of the Front, the French report a number of local successes along the Somme where they say they are clearing up German resistance; The French believe that the Germans now regard the Front on the Meuse as very important Yesterday they attacked on the Meuse, with especially trained troops and this attack failed; At the end of this account of the position of the day, it was insisted that the condition of the northern army may be precarious but is not desparate;

This morning's communique says that operations in the north continue with the same degree of intensity ~~around Lens;~~ Since XX On the Some and the Aisne there XXXX has been local infantry action here and there.

The French military sopkesman says that the troops of General Prioux are trying to get to Dunkirque, and considerable numbers ~~has~~ have already arrived. It's only in the course of today or tomorrow that we'll know how successful this action will be. The French and British Navies are working in close collaboration debarking supplies. There has been extremely brilliant air action particularly on the part of the British. The situation can be summed up as still critical but not hopeless.

There is no definite check on the number of Belgians who are still fighting but it's thought there are relatively few. It does~~n't~~ not appear that a ~~Belgian~~ German offensive in some other region than the North is imminent. There have been only local incidents on the rest of the front. Last night there was a good deal of action in the region east and a little west of Rethel.

The "Journal Officiel" announced this morning that two more classes were called to the army - the men who were born during the last quarter of 1919 and the first quarter of 1920; They must report on the eighth and ninth of June.

At two o'clock this afternoon ~~Paris~~ French time, XXXX both Chambers of the Belgian Parliament will sit separately ~~at Limoges;~~ The Cabinet Ministers will attend these sessions, and will meet together afterwards;

RE-TRAINING WOMEN WORKERS

FROM PARIS

No. 48
1 PM

The intensity of the fighting now has increased France's need for munitions and airplanes, and since a large part of her man-power is in the Army, she needs to find other workers to 'woman' her factories. Before the war there were some twenty schools for training the unemployed to do factory work; now there are about two hundred, supported by the Labor Department, and meant chiefly to train workers for war industries. They expect to turn out about ten thousand this year.

hours of practical work, one hour of classroom theory, and half an hour for lunch. Incidentally, I saw the first shift MAKING in a clean, light dining room eating a meal of beef, potatoes, vegetable, bread and red wine, for which they pay two francs, which is about four cents nowadays. The hours have not been lengthened, because most of the women have their housework to do besides, and they couldn't stand it.

The classroom work consists of elementary courses in arithmetic, geometry, drawing and practical technology. Most of them have little schooling, but they can all read and write. The five practical courses, consist of turning (tourage), milling, fraisage, mechanical adjusting, aviation adjusting, and riveting, all taught under the guidance of skilled foremen. Nothing that they make can be used, because they are really progressive exercises. The courses take from two to ten weeks to complete, depending on the subject matter, and there are no certificates. When the workers are judged competent, they are sent around to munitions and aviation factories which are keen to get them, for there's a great demand for such workers.

At the school, the women are paid eight francs per day, and they get twelve francs a day more if they dont also collect relief or a soldier's wife's allowance, which most of them have. A new additional system for giving cash prizes of several hundred francs to the best workers has just been started.

In the workshop I watched the women at their benches. They are allowed to be between twenty and forty years old, but they looked much nearer twenty and many were quite pretty, in spite of the regulation costume of dark blue overalls and kerchiefs on their heads. They are advised to wear gloves, but few of them bother to care for their hands. I talked to one who was filling a square piece of metal with neat holes and rivets. She lives at home with her mother, and her brother is in the army. She used to be a salesgirl in a hardware store, and told me with a sweet smile that she liked this machineshop work better. A young-looking fair-haired girl told me she was married to a soldier at the front; she used to be a stenographer, but there are no jobs for them now so she was glad to come to the school. Another, her face carefully made up above her practical overalls, said she used to be a manicurist, and she had no family in Paris but she lived in a hotel and an engineer with prewar tradeschool experience, ~~and a clear mind~~ The Director/knew all his pupils individually, and spoke to them in a gentle, friendly manner. He keeps in touch with his graduates, and had just returned from a visit to a factory where he went to see if they had suitable jobs and were satisfied. ~~He thinks it is important that they girls like their work, as well as knowing it, and from their expressions I thought they looked serious but content.~~

One woman in mourning came up to the Director in the workshop to tell him she had just got a job in an aviation factory, and thanked him for her training, which she said was the happiest time she had known since the war started.

This willing army of women who work seriously and like it, are throwing their weight into munitions and airplane factories to help France to win.

and Village of War from Paris

This morning,s communique is brief but may be momentous; It says that all information coming from the Front shows that a new battle has just begun; The line goes from between the sea and the road to Laon as far as Soissons;

The War Office Spokesman announced that the expected offensive began at 4 this morning, and he had news up to 10:15 Paris time, but it indicated nothing precise, and it's too soon to be sure just what form the offensive will take; At daybreak the Germans started with an attack based on artillery fire combined with dive bombing, but so far there is no sign of armoured cars or tanks. Later, the Germans started infantry attacks chiefly in the middle Somme and in the region east of the Oise River; The spokesman said that, frankly, was all they knew so far at Headquarters about this big offensive;

~~On the night of Monday to Tuesday, le Havre was violently bombed by German airplanes for almost three hours; About a dozen civilians were killed, and an unknown number of British soldiers; Last night there was another attack on Le Havre, and fires were started, but the exact results are not yet known;~~

New figures have been published in the newspapers this morning about Monday,s air attack on Paris; It is now said that there were 254 dead, of whom 195 were civilians, and - 652 wounded, of whom 545 were civilians; The French say that at least 25 German airplanes were brought down; In retaliation, Allied airplanes raided parts of Germany, last night, bombed petrol depots and attacked German communications in south Belgium .

VILLAGE AT WAR

FROM PARIS

Here in Paris people are well aware that a war is going on, and that not far away, ~~and day before yesterday it came into the city with the big air raid,~~ but I wondered whether the people who live two or three hundred miles away, in the safe regions ~~XXXXXXXXXXX~~ toward the southwest, were much affected by this war, so I went to see.

On the way down by motor with some French friends, we~~XX~~ were stopped six times along the road by soldiers asking for passports and the car registration card. At certain important intersections, over a hundred miles from Paris, there were machine-gun nests made of oil tins filled with sand, and frames covered with barbed wire ready to block the road, ten miles from any town. They were made by the English soldiers who look after this district. All along the highway were ~~XXXX~~ high, blue farm carts, the shape of the horses' collars showing that they came from the North, and filled with furniture, hay, children, bags, bedding, and always an old woman in the front and a bicycle or two hung at the back. I talked to some of these evacuated peasants who had come three hundred miles in the last two weeks. There were also a lot of automobiles with the Belgian red and white license plates.

On railway sidings in the peaceful green countryside, with yellow gentians livening the hedges, were ~~XXXX~~ miles of railroad cars, mostly pullmans and dining-cars, and the crack cross-Channel trains of pre-war use. In the fields, farmers' wives were hoeing, and cutting thistles from the wheat, ~~a kind of~~ work which they did not do until their husbands were mobilized, and they had to run the farm.

I stayed with a French family who live near a little village of 235 persons which will probably never be bombed, ~~XXX~~ but they dont forget there is a war. The ~~three~~ little girls of ~~six and eight~~ five to raise had for their dictation lesson the story of a soldier who was seriously wounded, and was in a hospital that was bombed, and they, with four little evacuated friends who are staying with them, built miniature forts in the woods, one representing France and one Germany, and carry on the war from day to day. They are planning to build a fort near France called England this week.

The children are raising rabbits now, for the family to eat, ~~the~~ to ~~the rationaing of meat,~~ help out the meat rations ~~and they sell the skins to a man who comes along the road ca ling out his mediaeval street cry for rabbit skins.~~ Their mother told me that the cost of food for her family was exactly twice as high for the month of April as it was for the month of October last year. ~~It~~ Food used to be cheaper in the country than in Paris, but now it costs the same, but there is less choice. Sugar is scarce, and cooking oil is just twice its usual price, when you can find it. * see page 3

The great joke of the family was that the cook, who has been with them almost forty years, has been mobilized one day in five, to stand at the village crossroads and ask strangers for their ~~XXXXXX~~ papers, so he can check up on any parachutists.

We saw him there on Sunday when we went to Church, with most of the other 235 inhabitants of the village, except for the thirty who are in the Army. After the regular mass, there was a procession, as there was in every church in ~~France~~ the country last Sunday, when the whole congregation , two by two, boys, girls, women and men, paraded along a flower-strewn path around the square ~~to the center of the town,~~ faced the dangerous frontiers of France, and the priest led a special service for the success of the Army in the defence of their country.

Naturally everyone is anxious about relatives at the front, so we were glad to find a letter from a nephew who served in the North. He said they had been frightfully bombed, that only he and a lieutenant had been left alive in his section, and that ~~XXX~~ he had helped to remove 100 dead and 300 injured from a station that had been bombed.

As we were finishing our Sunday roast beef, the Mayor's son came on his bicycle to tell us that 400 refugees were arriving by train in the next town, and that our village was to take care of 90 of them. We rushed over in a car ~~XXX~~ to the station, but the train was two hours late. The women of the town prepared hot bouillon and great hunks of bread spread with the local meat paste, and all the townsfolk turned out with their children in their Sunday best to see the arrival . The refugees looked tired and dirty, but all were polite and appreciative, even when the only room left for them was a straw mattress on the floor of some farm outbuilding. I helped put some stretchers into a farm truck, which was the best ambulance we had. One ~~XXX~~ had an old woman on it who had walked for three days after their farm was attacked, and then her feet were so cut and legs so swollen that she literally couldn't walk any more, so her husband, old and a bit stiff himself, had wheeled her for ~~XXX~~ fifty miles in a wheelbarrow that someone gave him, before they got on to the train. They had not been able to wash or dress her feet, which were beginning to putrify, and smelled ~~very~~ bad.

All afternoon we worked at feeding and transporting the refugees, who, added to the peasants who had already arrived, ~~XXX~~almost doubled the population of our village. ~~We put fourteen into an unused bakery in our farm, our place, and twelve more were taken in by the sisters who run the school, XXXXXX XXXXX

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I cannot help wondering what is wrong with American industry today. The tremendous growth of our industry is one of the shining examples of what can be done in a free enterprise system. In spite of that, the management and directors of many of these companies are constantly supporting, in one way or another, leftist sympathizers and leftist propaganda. All this leads up to the fact that I happened to hear Edward R. Murrow's second showing of Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, once on "Person-to-Person" and the second time on "See It Now." It was almost sickening to watch and listen to his speech before the graduating class of young students. It was even more sickening to think that such stuff was being dished out because it was made possible by the money collected from free enterprise.

I am enclosing a brochure on Dr. Ralph J. Bunche and hope that you will read it carefully. You may rest assured that all of the facts in it have been carefully documented. Also, there are many other facts which, if you would take the trouble to go to a public library and look up the references in the brochure, you would be astonished to learn. As you will see, if you take the trouble to read it, the brochure clearly shows the leftist sympathies of Bunche over a long period of years. I can find no denial by him or repudiation of these sympathies.

A copy of this brochure is being mailed to every officer and director of the Aluminum Co. of America and the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Very truly yours,

200 EAST 66 STREET
NEW YORK 21, N.Y.

Mr. Oscar S. Straus, President
Theodore Roosevelt Memorial Association.
120 Broadway
New York 5, N. Y.

Dear Oscar:

To say that I was horrified to read a news item in the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, dated September 16th, 1954, that the THEODORE ROOSEVELT ASSOCIATION was presenting to Dr. Ralph Bunche The Theodore Roosevelt medal for distinguished service for the year 1954, as an award for his work in international affairs is putting it very mildly indeed.

It would seem to me that, if the Board of Trustees of the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION considers these medals evidence of distinguished service, a very careful checkup of the recipient's record should be made.

Of course, I realize that to the average man in the street who reads the TIMES and the TRIBUNE only, and hears such commentators on the radio as Edward R. Murrow, Barry Gray, or Elmer Davis, it would seem that Dr. Bunche is a great and good man who has been persecuted without reason. But, when such an honor is being bestowed on him as the THEODORE ROOSEVELT medal, I would think that the Trustees should not be satisfied with simply newspaper statements on the qualities of any man, particularly about such a controversial figure as Dr. Bunche. Any committee bestowing such an honor should have made it a point to find out that both in Congress and other places there is serious question as to whether Dr. Bunche should be a trusted servant of the Government of the United States.

Starting from this single fact, it is very easy in the case of as prominent a man as Dr. Bunche to trace his statements and his connections over the past years. I suppose it would be impossible for your committee to get a transcript of Dr. Bunche's testimony and the testimony of other people about Dr. Bunche in the Loyalty Board Hearings that occurred; but there is much other available testimony and much documentary evidence comparatively easy to obtain. Even if the Trustees are unaware as to the infiltration of left wing propaganda into our news media, press, and radio reports and editorial opinions unsupported by independent research, these should not be the sole basis for the award of any distinguished honor. The fact that the DAILY WORKER and the left-wing press were unanimous in stating that Dr. Bunche was entirely cleared should have put you on warning.

To give the excuse that since the Loyalty Board had cleared Dr. Bunche even if so be the case - does not excuse the Trustees of the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION. The past decade has shown what type of people very often creep into the Loyalty Boards, and what pressure is put on those Loyalty Boards from mysterious sources.

As it is evident that the Trustees responsible for the presentation of this medal have made no careful study of this matter, I attach herewith some interesting documentary evidence regarding Dr. Bunche and some of the organizations with which he was connected:

I cannot understand why anyone who has had a past record of close affiliation with communism should be employed in a "sensitive spot" in our government, because such past connections would indicate, at the least, a certain instability, yet I can understand why people who have definitely repented and have set themselves out at great sacrifice to right, inasfar as it is possible for them to do so, the wrongs that they have committed, are perhaps, proper recipients of certain awards and medals. I can, however, find no record that Dr. Bunche has publicly stated his past connection or that he has ever repented on anything that he has said or done in regards to his left-wing activities, as have Mr. Louis Budenz, Mr. Joseph Kornfeder, Mr. Whittaker Chambers, Mr. Manning Johnson, and Mr. Benjamin Gitlow, to mention a few of those who have stood up and confessed openly "in the congregation".

You are the grandson of Mr. Oscar Straus, a distinguished patriot, who was in my father's cabinet. I am Theodore Roosevelt's son, and these awards are, therefore, connected both with Theodore Roosevelt and Oscar Straus. On account of our names it is our duty, insofar as our small ability lies, to protect the names that we bear. I know that when they were alive, both your grandfather and my father thought of America first, last and always, and although they are not here to consult with, I feel sure that they would be on the same platform to-day as they were in the past. We should be very careful not to let the names of those two men be connected with anything that is even doubtful.

The Trustees of the Theodore Roosevelt Memorial Association are exactly what the name implies. They are Trustees, and as Trustees should exercise extreme vigilance whenever they give an honor in the name of Theodore Roosevelt. I do not know how much you were connected with the award of this medal, but presume that those who choose the names must consult with you, as president of the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

I can perfectly understand and agree, that the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION, in view of Theodore Roosevelt's deep admiration for Booker T. Washington, and in view of his great interest in furthering the progress of the Negro in the United States, should always be on the lookout to find a negro worthy of receiving the Theodore Roosevelt medal. In the present case, I cannot understand why the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION did not present a medal to Mr. George Schuyler, the New York editor of the PITTSBURGH COURIER, the largest Negro newspaper in the United States. At great personal sacrifice, and undergoing enormous vilification, Mr. George Schuyler has fought communists among the negroes valiantly, when communism and all of the queer isms of the past two decades were very popular indeed, and while Dr. Bunche was connected with such leftist organizations as I have shown in my enclosure and was making marxist-communist statements in speeches not, to my knowledge, ever disavowed by him. Mr. Schuyler is still carrying on the fight most valiantly. He is a man of letters, and a crusader on the side of right. He is in every way qualified to receive a Theodore Roosevelt medal, due to his patriotism and courage.

In view of the facts that I have given you above, I think even at this late date that every effort should be made to rescind the medal that your Board of Trustees has voted to Dr. Bunche, and I suggest, as a substitute recipient, that you award it to Mr. George Schuyler - a man unlike Dr. Bunche, with a constant record of loyalty to our Republic.

I greatly regret that I have had to take this stand in opposition to so many good people and friends of mine, and friends of my father's, who are connected with the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION. But I feel it would be negligence of duty on my part if I did not point out what I consider to be carelessness, to say the least, on the part of the Board of Trustees of the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION. I do not want to see the THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION Trustees to be the unwitting tools of the sinister influences that are now so powerful in the Country - influences responsible for the strange courses and actions taken by many hitherto splendid Foundations.

It was carelessness on the part of the Trustees of the Carnegie Foundation that brought about the hiring of Alger Hiss. It was carelessness on the part of the Trustees of the Institute of Pacific Relations that brought about the long and treasonable record of that organization and the infiltration of such a bad element into it. Most, if not all, of the Trustees of the Carnegie Institute, and certainly most of the Trustees of the Institute of Pacific Relations were estimable men, busy with their own affairs, who became careless when they were managing the affairs of others. The THEODORE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION should take care not to follow the same course.

Sincerely yours,

Archibald B. Roosevelt

FOREWORD

This report intends to prove, without a shadow of a doubt, that Dr. Bunche for a number of years had expressed himself in writings, speeches, and organizational activity in a manner which paralleled the communist line in its major aspects. Further evidence is hereby presented to prove his expressions were of such a nature that they could only have been arrived at as a result of his going through a thorough indoctrination in communist methods and techniques. It will also be shown that his affiliations and activities were such as to fill the requirements necessary for a top level operative for the Kremlin apparatus.

It also presents authentic documentation to substantiate the following summation of Dr. Bunche's record of activities paralleling the communist line throughout the years which is so consistent that it seems impossible to interpret it as accidental:-

1. Travels in Africa, which coincided with the Kremlin's planting of agents in that part of the world, in order to lay the basis for racial explosions of the future. Bunche wrote from there (Journal of Negro Education) denouncing "Imperialist Capitalism" and advocated the elimination of the current social order in the mother countries. The fruits of the Kremlin infiltration in Africa can be seen today in the bloody Mau-Mau massacres. (1935-1936)

2. Wrote a pamphlet which advocated a communistic program in respect to the Negro question and advocated class war throughout the world asking the non-white peoples to look to the Soviet Union for inspiration and leadership. (1936)

3. Wrote a clearly communistic line in respect to education. He voiced the red line that "American education" is "goose step education". And that "Capitalism owns the colleges and universities by right of purchase". Bunche denounced "red riders", and "oath clauses". He complained that "in America" "we are living in an economy of capitalism and our educational system consistently harmonizes with the dominant capitalistic pattern". (1936)

4. Bunche was praised in the official theoretical red organ, THE COMMUNIST, published for upper echelon communists and supporters. One of the top communists, A. W. Berry, praised Bunche for "approaching the Marxist viewpoint" and "that Bunche realized the significance of the class struggle". Berry then described Bunche as an "active friend and supporter" of the working class, which in the communist aesopian manner means a friend of the Soviets, since they claim exclusive franchise as representing the "working class". (1937)

5. Contributed an article to the RACE MAGAZINE whereby he repeated the "class" position on the race question and considered those who called the National Negro Congress as "dominated by reds" and as "biased individuals". This magazine in its opening issue prominently announced that they are working for "a social upheaval which will plow up our institutions to their very roots and substitute a socialist order for the present capitalist imperialist order". (1936)

6. Was one of the small handful of persons who initiated and organized the National Negro Congress. This was a carefully planned maneuver of the Kremlin which was manipulated through the Communist International. A published account from the Communist International, before the National Negro Congress was organized, stated that "the development of a Negro people's front depends on a large measure upon the correct action of our revolutionary Negro cadres" and that "the programme of the National Negro Congress must be realized". Even though Bunche had expressed himself in clear cut communist terms and had agitated for the Kremlin line in Africa, this in itself would not have been enough to trust him in such an undertaking as spawning the National Negro Congress. As pointed out before, this was to be the vehicle to organize many millions of Negroes behind the Soviets throughout the world. To have been delegated the responsibility of organizing the N.N.C., Bunche must have had the complete confidence of the Kremlin masterminds who conceived of the maneuver some years before.

7. Bunche was part of the editorial apparatus of an openly communist magazine (SCIENCE AND SOCIETY) for over four years. He contributed to this publication and added his name and prestige as a Professor of Howard University even after the communists in their publication (THE COMMUNIST) openly stated that Science and Society magazine had as its function "to help Marxward moving students and intellectuals to come closer to Marxism-Leninism; to bring Communist thought into academic circles". (1935-40)

8. Dr. Bunche was appointed to his government job in the Office of Strategic Services at the recommendation of a person having a communist front record. If Bunche had conceivably been an ex-partisan of the communist cause and had then been an anti-communist, it is difficult to believe that a Government body like the OSS, which had been infiltrated by Red agents, would tolerate him, or that a man with a communist front background would recommend him for the position. In fact with communists controlling key posts in the OSS, Bunche was promoted steadily until he was chief of the African Section of that agency.

9. In a Senate probe by their Internal Security Sub-Committee it was brought out that Bunche had repeatedly pressured persons in charge of UN employment to hire a notorious communist agent, in spite of the fact that there was a derogatory report against the individual by a security agency of the Government.

10. Bunche was an official of the Institute of Pacific Relations, which has been definitely established as the top agency operated by communists to swing Soviet foreign policy into our government and to manipulate the betrayal of China to the Reds. (This resulted in tens of thousands of American boys losing their lives in Korea and in all probability will result in thousands more lives to be lost in the future). It must be remembered that Bunche had participated in small closed meetings with individuals who have since been proven to be communist agents. With Bunche's background and experience in communist philosophy and organization, it is hard to believe that he was an innocent bystander. Innocents are not allowed to lay down policy which the Kremlin is interested in or are they entrusted to manipulate it. Innocents are only manipulated themselves. The names in the IPR reports as published in over 6,000 pages by the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee couple Bunche's activity along with such Communist agents as Alger Hiss, Owen Lattimore, Philip Jaffe, Frank Coe, Harry Dexter White, David Weintraub and scores of others.

Actually the evidence of communistic writings and communistic organizational activity by Ralph Bunche is greater overall than the combined evidence that government agencies had when they first began to get interested in red activities of Alger Hiss, Remington, Harry Dexter White and the Rosenbergs. Bunche's communistic utterances and connections are there as a public printed record and it is a great puzzle as to why our Government officials have not taken appropriate action. Instead it seems, that there is an effort to hush up the entire matter.

In 1948 when Alger Hiss was being charged with espionage against his country Bunche offered him a letter of support and vindication which included the observation that he (Bunche) was "stunned by this utterly shameless attempt to smear your good name. Though you have been grievously wronged, I have full confidence in your complete vindication....." (Reference - article in the FREEMAN MAGAZINE by Victor Lasky page 134 October 1954).

It is true that some innocent dupes were drawn into the Hiss affair and there may be some excuse for them due to ignorance of communist techniques and trickery but in the case of Bunche, who has had long and extensive experience in the Marxist-Leninist school of activity and whose understanding of communism is both thorough and varied, there is no room for refuge behind the appellation of "innocent" or "dupe".

DEFINITIONS

In considering the record and activities of Ralph Bunche, or any other individual who has been active in Left-Wing circles, it is important and necessary that the political terms applied to such individuals be defined sharply and precisely. We hear such terms as "communist", "communist fellow-traveler", "communist sympathizer", "communist activist", a "dupe" of the communists, and "conscious" and "unconscious" carriers of either the whole or part of the "communist line". There is much misunderstanding as to what these designations mean. It is best to define these terms according to the classifications given them by the Kremlin chiefs themselves.

The term "communist activist" or "communist functionary", in the communist sense and among communists themselves, refers to an individual operating under the discipline of the communist machine and who is thoroughly schooled in communist techniques, in communist agitational and propaganda methods. The mere possession of a Communist Party membership book is not considered a significant criterion of an important communist, by the red leadership. The communist movement has long practiced the policy of maintaining a large portion of its membership without benefit of Communist Party membership books. There have been hundreds of communists without membership books operating under full Communist Party discipline, who have been considered more closely allied to the Communist Party machine than others who have carried such books.

A "communist" is defined by his superiors as a political soldier, with or without a membership book, operating for the Kremlin and is considered an important member only if he faithfully follows the aims and purposes handed down to him, carrying out his tasks in keeping with directives given him. He must reflect these in his assigned field either through speeches or writings or organizing activity or all of these functions combined. He must demonstrate a knowledge of communist techniques and communist terminology. He must also shift his propaganda in accordance to the communist line of the day.

It is impossible for a person accidently to coincide in his own personal independent views so as to match the communist line in all of its major features. It is quite possible that one may accidently coincide in viewpoint with some one part of the communist program, but, in respect to the overall line it is a mathematical impossibility for anyone to independently match the total red line in its various ramifications. Such impossibility is further compounded if the language used is strictly Marxist-Leninist.

EXCERPTS FROM EARLY WRITINGS

OF DR. RALPH J. BUNCHE

Journal of Negro Education

Our first printed record of Ralph Bunche's pro-communist utterances is in 1935 when he already displayed a knowledge of radical terminology which fits into what the communists call "the language of Marxism-Leninism". In reviewing a book in the Journal of Negro Education, a magazine issued by the Howard University in January 1935, Bunche wrote as follows:

"An appreciation of the moving forces behind modern imperialism as practiced by the capitalistic nations of the world does not seem to fall within the author's ken. One gathers, by broad implications that Mr. Mockerie feels that the African can get along well enough under the existing system if only some of the more burdensome and noxious restrictions are removed. This is, of course, a vain hope.

My own belief is that there is little hope for the African now, or in the future, so long as finance capitalism, dominates the economic systems of the mother countries."

CURRENT LITERATURE ON NEGRO EDUCATION by R. J. Bunche

The broad implication that the social systems of the countries, which have African colonies, must first be overthrown as a prerequisite of establishing an anti-capitalist system in Africa is quite obvious in Bunche's remarks. This necessarily pre-supposes the overthrow of the existing systems of society in Britain, France, Italy, Portugal and the United States. (It was and is the position of communists and their followers that the U.S. is in effect the controlling force in Liberia and that this constitutes the possession by America of an African Colony.)

It is interesting to note that standard Marxist-Leninist language was employed by Bunche which included the terms; capitalistic nations, finance capitalism, Imperialism, etc. The Marxist-Leninist objectives include not only the language but also sets the tone of communist social warfare which aims to overthrow the mother countries of these colonies.

In an article on Minority Groups Dr. Bunche carried out his concepts in keeping with the communist philosophy by mouthing certain fundamental Marxist cliches as follows:-

"Recent world history points out too clearly that modern democracy, conceived in the womb of middle-class revolutions, was early put out to work in support of those ruling middle-class interests of capitalistic society which fathered it. It has remained their loyal child and has rendered profitable service for them. But when in modern European countries it came to be vigorously wooed by those mass interests of society whose lot under modern industrialism has been that of cruel oppression, democracy was quickly discredited and disowned, and fascism became the favored child of Big-Business-controlled governments. The significant fact is that democracy, while never offered in any large measure to the black populations of the world, has been extended to the great masses of the working-class population only so long as it was employed by them as a harmless device involving no real threat to the increasing control of the society by the ruling classes."

This entire concept and phraseology is part and parcel of the standard communist propaganda. This line follows thus:

1. Modern democracy was born by the impetus and leadership of manufacturing and commercial elements in order to overthrow the restrictive fuedal order.

2. That democracy was permitted in a limited way for the poorer population in order to delude them and deceive them into thinking that this was a government of all the people.

3. That the negro people as a whole were deprived of even those limited rights.

4. That exploitation was becoming so flagrant with the growth of big business that fascistic forms were substituted, in place of the illusion of democracy, in order to maintain the oppression.

In the above mentioned article, Bunche repeatedly states that alternatives of a peaceful nature cannot serve the negro people. Under the heading of "VIOLENT TACTICS" he does however present the communist position as follows:-

"The Communist Party has seriously proselyted among the Negro group but with only indifferent success. The immediate task of such movements in this country is to develop radical class consciousness among the working class masses of both white and Negro populations, with a view to the ultimate recognition of an identity of interest and consequent black and white solidarity in a militant labor movement." Page 312, J.N.E., July 1935.

In presenting the immediate program of the Communist Party as one striving for a class-conscious unity between white workers and Negroes, Bunche admits an expert knowledge of the communist position. This knowledge precludes all possibility that his reflecting communist thought could be done through ignorance or innocence.

Dr. Bunche wrote in the JOURNAL OF NEGRO EDUCATION, in the capacity of Professor of Political Science and as such must have reflected his political beliefs to his students. He considered himself a radical teacher and as such took up the cudgels on behalf of all radical teachers and long ago began to denounce all "loyalty oaths", red - riders and other measures which required teachers to conduct themselves in a loyal manner.

The excerpts below show that Bunche displayed an open defiance against attempts to keep our teachers within the confines of conducting their classes in the interests of good Americanism. His writings on this subject sound exactly as the red teachers of today do in denouncing Congressional probes into subversion in our schools:-

"In considering what may be done in the way of reorganizing any educational system, white or black, it must also be kept in mind that the dominant controls of the society are exerted over the teacher. Educators, if they are frank, admit their circumscriptions under the present organization of the society. We are now witnessing an unusual era of academic repression, but the controls are always present, in good times or bad. The repressive measures, 'red-riders,' gag-laws and oath clauses of the present period of hysteria are merely forceful reminders of the fundamental bias of our educational system. It is more than significant that radical teachers have always been in jeopardy; that long before the depression teachers were forbidden to join teachers' unions, though it is difficult to find any instances of conservative teachers being dismissed for their points of view. The idea has always been widely current among the powers that be in education that the teacher does not have the same rights as other citizens to speak or publish his views on social questions. Moreover, it would seem valid to assume that where one teacher is known to have been dismissed from his job because his ideas were in conflict with the controlling interests of his educational institution, thousands of others are cowed and remain too timid to take the risk of venturing an opinion on any 'dangerous' subject, or even to protest against the restraint."

Education in Black and White pages 356-7 Bunche

Bunche continually railed against the free-profit-system and kept repeating over and over again, that capitalism is the main enemy and complained that our society taught its children a "bias in favor of the culture of capitalism":-

"Though there are some who would will it otherwise, in America today education is compelled to reflect the status quo. We are living in an economy of capitalism and our educational system consistently harmonizes with the dominant capitalistic pattern. Our schools are extremely sensitive to the fluctuations of capitalism. When capitalism prospers, the schools prosper. When capitalism suffers from depression, school budgets are drastically cut. When capitalism is hard-pressed with criticisms for its shortcomings, the schools are expected to provide its advocates, and if they demur, for reasons of educational ideals, capitalism tightens the economic screws until the schools surrender. Though the schools are non-profit enterprises themselves, they operate within the framework of a profit economy, and there are rigid limits to their activities. On relatively trivial matters they may exercise a modicum of freedom but in all really vital matters they must reflect the will of the groups which hold the reins of power in the state. The American educational system, in its control, financial support, faculty and students, manifests a definite bias in favor of the culture of capitalism."

Education in Black and White Bunche

Bunche re-inforced his comments by the purely communist concept that educational equality is impossible under our present system of society:-

"The fact is that under our present system it is impossible to achieve educational equality for all members of any group in the society. Public schools, for example, are supported by taxation. The revenue derived from taxation will depend largely upon the relative prosperity of the propertied interests in the particular locality. Since wealth is unequally distributed in the country the present glaring inequalities in the distribution of funds for the support of education will persist even for 'White Education.' The basic question for all schools is not one of copying the 'white man's education,' but one of developing a system of education which will afford both white and black students a sound basis for understanding the society in which they live and for attacking the problems confronting them. White as well as Negro schools are woefully deficient in this respect."

Education in Black and White Page 355 Bunche

The next quote shows that Bunche took the typically communist position that "capitalism owns the colleges and universities" and "nor can it (Ed:- American Education) teach the student the truth". His contention that our educational system pursues a policy of indoctrination of prejudices "in the capitalist culture" is a repetition of the Kremlin brand of slander carried on against our system of individual freedom:-

"In truth, capitalism owns the colleges and universities by right of purchase. These institutions are supported either by taxation paid largely by corporations and large property owners, or else by direct endowments, gifts, and contributions by the commercial class. It is not unusual therefore that the schools should be expected to foster and cultivate capitalistic ideas. It is easy to imagine what would happen quickly to the University administration or school board which would attempt to give any other orientation to the educational process. The universities themselves have a vested interest in the profit economy because of their investments in all sorts of capitalistic enterprises. The returns of these investments determine the financial status of the institutions. Of necessity, American education thus becomes 'goose-step' education. It can be only relatively free. It cannot vigorously devote itself to the task of inoculating the student with a burning desire for the pure truth. Nor can it fearlessly teach the student the truth. It is compelled to pursue a policy of indoctrination -- with all of the attitudes, beliefs, stereotypes, and prejudices which have been cultivated in the capitalist culture and which are vital to it."

Bunche's solution of the problems of education which he raises also parallels that of the Soviet propaganda line that special "labor schools" must be set up to give working people courses which Bunche states that if they were given in our "advanced educational institutions" then the business interests in every community would immediately put up a howl that the schools were "red and fostering revolutionary meetings on their campuses":

"The white and black mill and factory workers in all sections of the country require the same type of education - an education which will give them a true understanding of their status in the industrial order and an insight in the nature of that order. Under present conditions this cannot be done in our schools; this sort of training is gotten by the workers themselves in their labor organizations and their labor schools, of these latter there are too few. It would, of course, be a splendid thing if our advanced educational institutions were in a position to offer extension courses in workers' education for the adult workers of the community, black and white. There is not much possibility of this being done, however, for the business interests in every community would immediately put up the howl that the schools were 'red' and fostering 'revolutionary' meetings on their campuses. Even the Federal Workers' Education projects have suffered from this sort of organized attack."

PAMPHLET - A WORLD VIEW OF RACE

In 1936 Ralph Bunche wrote a booklet called "A WORLD VIEW OF RACE". In this publication he advocated the classic position of the communists in respect to the Negro question.

Bunche lays the foundation in typically Marxist fashion by tying in the racial groups as a mere part of the class struggle in America. In parroting the communist position of pitting the workers against the capitalists, Bunche had the following to say:-

"THE 'RACE PROBLEM' SEEN AS A 'CLASS PROBLEM'"

"One of the latest and soundest views of the American race problem, and, for that matter, the race problem throughout the world, regards it, then, as merely one aspect of the class struggle. That is to say that differences in 'race,' differences in skin color, hair texture, language, religion or culture traits, are employed as devices by the privileged, ruling classes of the society to rationalize and promote their continued domination over and exploitation of the great numbers of the population. Thus it can be pointed out that the American Negro, by force of economic circumstances, is principally identified with the American working class and peasant elements of the population. The development of Negro business enterprise is impossible at this late stage in our industrial process, if it ever was possible. Similarly, it follows that no separate black economy can be erected within the walls of the white economy, as the movement for Negro business presupposes. The Negro must develop, therefore, a consciousness of class interest and purpose, and must strive for an alliance with the white working classes in a common struggle for economic and political equality and justice. The Negro can make significant progress toward these objectives against the obstacles of private prejudice and public discrimination and injustice, only by uniting with the poor whites of the South and North. This objective is admittedly difficult of realization. Mutual suspicion and enmity between the white and black groups is an ever-present source of frustration. The minds of both groups have been poisoned against each other over a period of generations.

There are encouraging signs, however, that the problem of the status of the Negro in the United States is losing its traditional purely racial nature and is being increasingly identified with the growing struggle of the white workers and small farmers against the white (and, for that matter, black) captains of industry, landlords and bankers. The depression, ably abetted by the policies of the New Deal, has made the American population, white and black, increasingly class-conscious."

While laying the basis for the communist concept of irreconcilable struggle between the capitalists and the workers, Bunche then proceeds to describe how the "race" question will be solved after "capitalism" is done away with:-

"If the fundamental ailments of the American economy are remedied, the 'race question' will loom less large. So long as the society endures an economy which demands and thrives on human exploitation, race will be employed as an effective device in the promotion of the process group exploitation, economic, political and cultural. In such a society and under such an economy attempts at solving the 'race problem' will be futile."

Bunche thus lays the basis of need for communist revolution by characterizing our way of life as "human exploitation - economic, political and cultural." Since all of our social life comes in under the above three categories the obvious propaganda basis is laid for the aim for another social order which is fundamentally different.

The next excerpt shows the class-struggle process as inevitably leading to a showdown between the workers and capitalists and that the elimination of private property interests and rights is a necessary process before the race and class problems are resolved. It is interesting to note in view of his U.N. position that Dr. Bunche considered the elimination of capitalism as a necessary condition before a proper World Order can be established.

"The plain fact is that the contemporary international order, characterized by its capitalist-imperialist organization, has no possibility of effectively controlling the destiny of such peoples and areas. For the international order cannot override the existing vested capitalistic interests which muster the forces of the state for their protection. As the world is now organized these interests cannot be overcome, for they are intimately tied up with the class-relations of capitalist society. The same forces which protect them are the exact forces which protect and promote the interests of the capitalist within the capitalist state to which he claims allegiance. Just as the capitalist state in its internal affairs maintains a legal and constitutional system designed to protect absentee ownership and safeguard those property rights which make the capitalist supreme, just so, in the realm of external affairs, the state's authority, by the very nature of his relationship to it, must be employed to impose that type of supremacy over other peoples.

It is only when this supremacy and privilege are dissolved and when it is no longer within the power of the privileged property-holding class to determine the institutional life and habits of the modern state, that there can be hope for the development of an international order and community which will promise the subject peoples of the world genuine relief from the heavy colonial burdens of imperialist domination."

As to where such groups (as the American Negro) can look to for leadership and inspiration Dr. Bunche gives the standard Bolshevik answer - to the Soviet Union, of course. In fact he considered it "both logical and likely":-

"If the oppressed racial groups, as a result of desperation and increasing understanding, should be attracted by the principles of equality and humanitarianism advocated by the Soviet Union (and it is both logical and likely that they will) then racial conflict will become intensified. In such case, however, racial conflict will be more directly identified with class conflict, and the oppressed racial groups may win the support of oppressed, though previously prejudiced, working-class groups within the dominant population."

In concluding his pamphlet Ralph Bunche tied in the whole communist aim of merging racial dissidents into the class struggle for the possession of the whole world. He talks of "titanic" and "uncompromising struggles" between "the working and owning classes." The last sentence of the pamphlet talks of war. It is not of ordinary war that Bunche speaks of, for even as terrible a thing as race war is relegated to a mere "sideshow". The war that he describes is a "gigantic class war". And its locale? The same as the operations of the Kremlin forces. It will be "waged in the big tent we call the world."

"There will be sporadic outbreaks when subject peoples become restless under too harsh measures of imperialistic oppression. But the signs throughout the world are unmistakable. Despite the frantic efforts of many of those who control national and world policy to conjure up international race issues, the lines are forming in a totally different manner. Race issues appear but tend to merge into class issues. Throughout the world the issue between working and owning classes is sharpening. The titanic conflicts of the future will be the product of the uncompromising struggles between those who have and those who have not. These conflicts now wage within all groups, racial and national. Insofar as the great masses of the black and yellow races are concerned, the status of economic and political inferiority which they have been compelled to accept results in their automatic identification with the working and 'have not' classes of the society. They are now beginning to understand the true nature of the issues confronting them. Moreover, they will eventually appreciate the great possibilities in their numerical strength as a weapon in their struggle for justice. Their organized and directed support of the working class of the dominant populations of the world will bring an unchallengeable power to this class.

And so class will some day supplant race in world affairs. Race war then will be merely a side-show to the gigantic class war which will be waged in the big tent we call the world."

Any further doubt as to whether the above pamphlet by Ralph Bunche carried the Communist position on the Negro question can be completely dispelled with the below quotation from the magazine called the "COMMUNIST" which was issued as "A Magazine of the Theory and Practice of Marxism-Leninism Published Monthly by the Communist Party of the U.S.A." In the issue of the COMMUNIST October, 1937 Bunche's pamphlet is reviewed by Abner W. Berry, a high ranking communist for many years. The entire first page is here quoted to show the enthusiasm with which the official communist hierarchy greeted Bunche's pamphlet. When A. W. Berry states that "Significant in Dr. Bunche's analysis is his emphasis on the class conflict underlying so-called race issues" he gives Bunche full credit for echoing the basic communist credo of class struggle to overthrow our social order. (Ed. Note: Former high level communist leaders have testified that all book reviews in the COMMUNIST are first passed on by the Polit-Buro leaders of the Communist Party to make sure that the review is important enough for the communist Cause and make certain that it is in keeping with the Party doctrine.):

"A STEP TOWARD NEGRO LIBERATION"

A WORLD VIEW OF RACE, by Ralph J. Bunche, Ph.D., Associate in Negro Education. Washington, D. C., 98 pp. Twenty-five cents.

"A fresh breeze is blowing through the class rooms of American colleges, carrying with it elements of Marxist and progressive thought. One of the welcome fruits of this renaissance is a world-embracing study of race attitudes by Dr. Bunche, professor of political science at Howard University.

The brochure begins with the discussion of world race theories, in which the author shows that the basis for racialistic theories is mythical rather than scientific. He properly estimates the dangers inherent in the propagation and spread of such theories, as, for example, the attempt to merge race and nation in Nazi Germany. Significant in Dr. Bunche's analysis is his emphasis on the class conflict underlying so-called race issues. A starting point toward a solution of the problem is his conclusion:

> 'Group antagonisms are social, political and economic conflicts, not racial, though they are frequently given a racial label and seek racial justification' (p. 23).

This point is further developed and elaborated in the second chapter. Discussing the historical basis for present-day prejudices, Dr. Bunche points out:

> 'The historic origin of racial prejudices and conflicts is to be found in migration of human groups and the invasions by conquering peoples of territory inhabited by other peoples. These conflicts did not result from any innate aversion of one racial group toward another, however....The true historical explanation is that the conquering peoples constituted themselves the ruling class and relegated the conquered group to an inferior status. Thus race became a badge of social superiority and in time the dominant race assumed for itself qualities of moral, intellectual and political superiority as well as economic privilege' (p. 26).

Approaching the Marxist viewpoint, the author follows up this statement by analyzing the class antagonisms within the dominant races, inferring an alliance of the subject people with the workers of both races.

The main areas of racial conflict where 'racial relations of today are pregnant with a danger for the future peace and development of the world' are Africa, West Indies, the Orient, Germany and the United States, according to Dr. Bunche. He discusses the issues in each area. In writing of the conflict in America, the author notes that even within the 'solid white front' against the threat of 'Negro domination' during the Civil War there were differences as between slave-holders and the poor whites.

That Dr. Bunche realizes the significance of the class struggle is clear. He reasons that with trade union policies based upon 'the inevitable realization that workers of the two groups (Negro and white) arrayed against each other in racial conflict have more in common than workers of the dominant group have in common with employers of the dominant group...racial conflict tends to be lessened, but class conflict...is intensified' (pp. 31-32). The solution of the 'race' problem according to the author lies along the road of working class freedom:

> 'The Negro must develop, therefore, a consciousness of class interest and purpose, and must strive for an alliance with the white working class in the common struggle for economic and political equality and justice. The Negro can make significant progress toward these objectives against the obstacles of private prejudice and public discrimination and injustice only by uniting with the poor whites of the South and North' (p. 90).

The working class can recognize, unmistakably, in this statement the voice of an active friend and supporter. It is a wholesome and hopeful sign that this statement represents also the social credo of an increasing number of Negro intellectuals."

BOOK REVIEW by A. W. Berry page 965 of A WORLD VIEW OF RACE by Ralph J. Bunche THE COMMUNIST October 1937 Vol. XVI No. 10

Before passing on to the next phase, it is of interest to present the official point of view of the Communist Party as enunciated by its leader in the United States, Earl Browder, on the question of the Negroes in relation to the class struggle and the march toward revolution. The two excerpts below sound like an echo of Bunche's words on the same subject. The following position was presented during the same period that Bunche wrote on the identical subject:-

"The purpose of our work on the Negro question is to establish unity of white and black proletariat in a common struggle to overthrow capitalism, and the leadership of the proletariat over the Negro masses in the struggle for their national liberation."

COMMUNISM IN THE UNITED STATES, a book by Earl Browder Page 292 - 1935

"We live and fight within the world fortress of capitalism, of imperialism, which finds one of its main instruments of rule in the division between white and Negro workers. But this division also represents one of the weakest spots of American imperialism, where we can strike quickest and hardest, it represents a pre-capitalist survival, a relic of slavery and feudalism, a crying anachronism, embodying all the contradictions of the decaying imperialist world. In this discussion we have more effectively armed ourselves with the Leninist theory, whereby we can call forth for struggle all the revolutionary forces generated by this national oppression of the Negroes, link them up with the rising forces of the proletarian class struggle under the leadership of the Communist Party, and thus with multiplied capacity for effective battle against the oppressors, the imperialist bourgeoisie, we will 'sail into the face of the storm' of the revolutionary mass struggles that are being prepared in America on a gigantic scale."

RACE MAGAZINE

In a magazine called "RACE", which was organized and completely controlled by well known communists (including one who had been a several times delegate to the Communist International in Moscow from the Communist Party of the U.S.), Dr. Bunche wrote an article reiterating the orthodox communist position that the race problem is a part of the class struggle and that The National Negro Congress, which was formed in 1936, reflected "the ideology of organized labor was dominant". In communist nomenclature the ideology of organized labor is Marxism, since Labor, as such, has no particular ideology separate and apart from the rest of the population:

"Biased individuals saw the Congress inspired and dominated by the 'reds'. A more sober appraisal is perhaps in order."

ALERT AND ALIVE, (Dr. Bunche's Sub-Title)

"Quite the most significant feature of the Negro Congress was the fact that it constituted the first sincere effort to bring together on an equal plane Negro leaders, professional and white collar workers with Negro manual workers and their leaders and organizers. The result was gratifying to the latter. It was, to say the least, an educational experience for the Negro leaders and professional and white collar groups. In no other general Negro gathering has the note of labor been so popularly received. The ideology of organized labor was dominant."

Article by Ralph J. Bunche - "Triumph? or Fiasco?")

It is quite significant, as will be shown later, that Bunche declares that those who called the National Negro Congress as "dominated by reds" are "biased".

What is particularly important is the fact that Bunche was associated with a Magazine that was not only run by known reds but openly proclaimed in its first issue that its object was to "plow up our institutions to their very roots and substitute a socialist order for the present capitalist-imperialist order.":-

"That the special system of discrimination against the Negro in America is so deeply rooted in the very foundations of the present social order and the vested interests of dominant capitalism that there is no complete 'solution' of this basic problem of American life short of a fundamental reconstruction of society, a social upheaval which will plow up our institutions to their very roots and substitute a socialist order for the present capitalist-imperialist order."

THE NATIONAL NEGRO CONGRESS AND DR. BUNCHE

The story of The National Negro Congress is one whereby the Kremlin leaders managed to get a grip on the influential section of the Negro people in this country which they had not been able to accomplish until this Congress was put into action. Previous to 1936 the Communist Party of the U.S.A., upon instructions from the Kremlin, began to send in its small negro membership into existing non-communist Negro organizations. When this infiltration job was completed, the Moscow leaders through the Communist International instructed the communists in America to organize a Negro Congress which would pretend to be a representative body for all the Negroes in the United States, but actually be under the firm control of the Kremlin.

The purpose of this maneuver was obvious. Hitherto the communists had been operating feverishly to get a grip upon the mass of American Negroes and had been very unsuccessful in their attempts. The Kremlin had decided many years previously that the millions of Negroes in this country would be ideal political fodder which could be used in revolutionary activity against our form of government. They had failed in this way to unite the negroes under the open banner of communism. Other subterfuges were needed. In preparation for this day, scores of Negro communists were trained in the advanced schools of revolutionary tactics in Moscow.

In the organization of the National Negro Congress, however, the Red bosses did not trust the Negro communists to do the job. Previous experience had shown that the freedom loving American negroes rebelled against communist discipline and the turnover of negroes in the Communist Party was higher than that of any other group. Therefore, even in the National Negro Congress, organizations of white membership were allowed to send delegates. Needless to say, most of these white organizations were either communist fronts or were other organizations which had been previously infiltrated.

The failures that the communists had among the negroes had taught them that this operation must be carefully and thoughtfully carried out. Only the most trusted and most thoroughly indoctrinated negro communists were to be entrusted with the task of organizing and launching this new endeavor.

A number of ex-communists, who had been in on the plot in high places, have testified to the extent of this operation and that only the most trusted red agents were given the task of launching the National Negro Congress.

In 1940, while writing about the National Negro Congress in the Gunnar Myrdal-Carnegie studies on the Negro question, Bunche boasted that the original meetings which initiated the National Negro Congress were made by him and his associates in Howard University and in his home in Washington, D. C. in 1935.

In fact, the official communist publications gave him full credit as one of the initiators in their own publications as follows:-

"Among other outstanding participants were Dr. Ralph J. Bunche of Howard University; Lester Granger of the Workers Council of the National Urban League; A. W. McPherson, of the Steel and Metal Workers Union; and Olive M. Stone, of the North Carolina Institute of Social Science." (The Negro and the Democratic Front - Book - Publisher - International Publishers, N. Y. copyright, 1938. P. 69.)

James Ford, the writer of the above, was the leading Negro member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the United States and was involved in meetings with Ralph Bunche on the question of the National Negro Congress (according to testimony of leading ex-communists.)

The next quote, from a recent communist book, written by W. Z. Foster, the current head of the Communist Party, confirms Bunche's role in connection with the National Negro Congress:-

"Among those present were such notables as Ralph Bunche, W.E.B. DuBois, A. Philip Randolph, R.A. Carter, John P. Davis, James W. Ford, and others." (Book - History of the Communist Party by W. Z. Foster, International Publishers, 1952. P. 309)

Foster and Ford also confirm Bunche's contention that Howard University (where he worked as a professor of Political Science) was the locale of the Negro Congress planning in May, 1935, one year before the Negro Congress was convened:-

"The rising spirit of struggle among the Negro people during these years reflected itself in the National Negro Congress, organized in Chicago, February 14-16, 1936. The N.N.C. grew out of a conference held previously under the auspices of Howard University and the Joint Committee on National Recovery." (Book - HISTORY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE U.S., W. Z. Foster, International Publishers, 1952. P. 308)

"There were other speakers who made valuable contributions on the plight of the Negro at the May Conference at Washington. Space will not permit us to quote from all of them. Among these were: Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, of Howard University; Lester Granger, of the Workers Council of the National Urban League; A. W. McPherson, of the Steel and Metal Workers Union; John McKinney, of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union; Olive M. Stone, of the North Carolina Institute of Social Science." (THE COMMUNIST, April 1936, Vol. XV No. 4, page 322. Article: "The National Negro Congress" by James W. Ford.)

However, it should not be construed that the process which started the National Negro Congress originated with the May, 1935 conference, between Bunche and his cohorts. Actually the order to start the Congress, as is shown in the following quote, came from the Central Committee of the Communist Party, U.S.A., as enunciated by its leading Negro member, James W. Ford, in 1934:-

"It may be remembered that the National Negro Congress was proposed last May at a national conference held in Washington. Earlier in January, 1934, at a symposium held in New York between Frank R. Crosswaith, Oscar De Priest, and myself, I made a suggestion for the calling of a National Negro Congress." (THE COMMUNIST, April 1936. Page 318 James W. Ford.)

The method in which the whole process of building the Negro Congress was frankly and clearly laid out a few months before the Howard University conference (mentioned by Bunche) by the Central Committee of the Communist Party to its members at a special plenary session of the National Committee of the Communist Party to give instructions as to how the entire matter was to be carried out among the Negro people. In reading this excerpt, it must be kept in mind that this was issued to members of the Communist Party more than a year before the National Negro Congress was convened:-

"In connection with the question of the united front on the Negro question - if we work properly now and see that we must penetrate these organizations, there is the possibility of building up a National Negro Congress on a broad united front basis. We had a discussion about this conference in the N. Y. District in which we discussed the Negro question, and the possibility of a National Negro Congress. If we make the proper orientation, we will be able to build the biggest Congress of Negro people ever held. It means patient work in Negro organizations." (PARTY ORGANIZER, March 1935, Vol. VIII No. 3, issued by the Central Committee of the Communist Party, U.S.A. Article: "How to Penetrate the Negro Organizations" (Excerpts from Report to Plenum). Page 21.)

This instructive to organize a Negro Congress was issued to all communists, whether secret or open, in the following directive:-

"In the development of this work it shall be our aim to lay a firm basis for the realization on a local scale of our major political task in Negro work nationally, namely:

1. The promotion of the movement for the National Congress on Negro Rights, tying up our local campaign with the general issues around which this Congress will be convened, such as the campaign for the enactment of the L.S.N.R. Bill for Civil Rights, for the freedom of the Scottsboro Boys and Herndon, against lynching, etc." (THE COMMUNIST, JUNE, 1935, Vol. XIV No. 6, page 575, "The Development of Struggle for Negro Rights".)

After the National Negro Congress was organized, the Communist Party took full and public credit for the creation of the Congress. It was understood by all and sundry that this was a child of the Kremlin. Ralph Bunche, incidentally, was elected to the National Committee of the Negro Congress. The process of getting control of the minds of the Negro leadership was well on its way. The goal set for the Communist Party of the U. S. by the Kremlin through the Communist International in its World Congress in Moscow in 1935, on the question of the American Negroes, was gathering full steam. The boast by American Communists of their handiwork in this respect and the report on how the Communist International instructives were the guiding light is illustrated in the next two quotations:-

"It is equally beyond dispute that the pioneering and trail-blazing work of the Communists has played a great part in opening the road towards the now developing broad people's movement. Our Party as a whole can justly take pride - not to rest in self satisfaction - in the role it played and is playing in awakening the Negro people, in helping to organize them, in bringing forth such Negro leaders as Ford and Herndon, and in promoting that united and people's front for Negro rights which resulted in the creation of the National Negro Congress." (THE COMMUNIST, MARCH, 1936, Vol. XV. No. 3, page 202. "Review of the Month".)

"I would say that the main feature of the past year has been that in the field of work among the Negro people, as in most of the other fields of our work, we have begun to realize on a mass scale the results of the line of the Seventh World Congress of the Communist International. We have begun to emerge from sectarian isolation and become a mass influence, a mass power. As in our Party work generally, this has been accompanied by a sharpening of all the problems involved in our work. All of our weaknesses and inadequacies come out most sharply now, precisely because we have made some tremendous gains and thereby face responsibilities which politically we feel equipped to meet." (Book THE NEGRO AND THE DEMOCRATIC FRONT. By James W. Ford, International Publishers, page 95.)

It is necessary to present the following list of excerpts to emphasize the fact that the National Negro Congress was a Kremlin operation which could, and was, carried out by Kremlin agents, working consciously towards that goal:-

"Comrades: This convention, in my opinion, emphasized repeatedly the importance of the Negro question. I want to take the few minutes disposed to me to propose the concrete work of the Negro field.

Comrades, as the menace of fascism threatens the Negro people with double ferocity, we find at this moment the very sincere desire for both black and white to unite in a concrete form in the struggle against fascism. When we do this we carry out the tradition of Lenin and Stalin. Lenin told us years ago that we did not pretend to be pure Communists, at all times to be practical people. While we do not negate the slogan of self-determination for the Negro people in the United States, we are today seeking the most practical means to develop the struggle of the Negro people toward this ultimate slogan known as the right of self-determination. And this practical weapon is the National Negro Congress."

"....The question of securing these National Negro Congress sponsors should be one of the essential points of all of our discussions from now on. Comrades in trade unions should consult the educational committee of their unions and arrange to include in their educational program discussion on the National Negro Congress. Meetings should be covered by people with folders, leaflets, sponsor buttons. Even at this convention we have given sponsor buttons to many of the comrades. There is nothing to hide. We openly declare we are responsible for bringing 1,000 sponsors in the New York State apparatus of the Communist Party.

"The Communist Party will continue to see the Negro question as a special question of approach. The Communist Party precisely by assisting the building of the N.N.C. refutes the theories of the Socialists in their recent resolution that attempts to put the Negro people on the same par with the conditions of the white and other people in the United States. We recognize this as a special question. We bring this out at this convention in order that the comrades will see the necessity of using the building of the N.N.C. as a practical question and concrete means of approaching the Negro question in a special manner." (Book - PROCEEDINGS 10TH CONVENTION. Communist Party New York State, May 20-23, 1938, pp. 253-254-255)

"We Communists must organize all our forces to render great assistance to the National Negro Congress in carrying out its program. We should organize all our fractions and guide them in their work in the various organizations in which there may be Party members. If we develop systematic work on the basis of our concentration policies in the various Negro communities and carry on a fight against sectarian methods of work, we shall be able very soon to fulfill the task of developing a broad people's front among the Negro people in the United States against fascism and war and for the liberation of the Negro people." (THE COMMUNIST, June 1936, Vol. XV No. 6. Page 561. Article: "Build the National Negro Congress Movement" by James W. Ford.)

"We Communists were never doubtful about the significance or the outcome of the National Negro Congress. We were not deterred by the charges of 'Communist domination'. We were guided by what we knew of the desire of the Negro masses for united action."

".....The National Negro Congress recorded progress made by Communists and the many delegates who supported our program, in the increasing work we are carrying on in the various organizations of the Negro people. Our modest successes are, however, just beginnings. We must now undertake to profit from our experiences, mistakes, shortcomings and successes, by showing what changes are necessary in our methods of work to build the National Negro Congress."

"..We Communists must organize all our forces to render great assistance to the National Negro Congress in carrying out its program." (BOOK - THE NEGRO AND THE DEMOCRATIC FRONT by James W. Ford, Page 69, 76, 85.)

"Some people think because we do not insist that the issue of the right to self-determination be adopted now by the Negro Congress, our Party is abandoning its revolutionary demand for the right to self-determination in the Black Belt in the South. Nothing is further from the truth. Never was it more clear than it is today that the complete liberation of the people in the Black Belt will be accomplished only by the revolutionary overthrow of the white landlords and capitalists, the destruction of the semi-slave agricultural relations and the realization of the right to self-determination. But there is a problem which we must face. And how must we face it? The problem is how to link up the daily struggles of the Negro Masses in the Black Belt today for their partial economic and political demands with our revolutionary slogan for the right to self-determination. It is clear that the Negro masses are not yet ready to carry through the revolution which would make possible the right to self-determination. But they are ready to fight against jim-crowism and oppression, for democratic rights and other partial economic and political demands. Our task, therefore, is not to stand passively by and wait until the Negro toilers become ready for the revolution. No! Our task is to join with them in the organization for their immediate struggle and strengthen their position economically and politically, strengthen the bonds between the white and Negro toilers, and in this way create the transition to the revolutionary struggle which will make possible the realization of the right of the Negro masses in the Black Belt to self-determination."

The United Front-The Key to Our New Tactical Orientation by Earl Browder

The top leadership took official cognizance of the communist success through the National Negro Congress and published an account of the role of that organization in the process of communist revolution. This was published in the INTERNATIONAL PRESS CORRESPONDENCE, a publication which was the official organ of the Communist International and was published in every major language in the world.

"The work of the Communist vanguard within the Negro group is of the most profound importance. Success in the struggle for unity at the National Negro Congress, the development of a Negro people's front depends in a large measure upon the correct action of our revolutionary Negro cadres. The development of tried and true revolutionary cadres and the strengthening of our revolutionary organizations among the Negro people, is now of the most profound importance. The development of the Negro people's front is dependent upon this. In turn, the development of tried and true revolutionary cadres among the Negro toilers is dependent upon the development of the broadest possible united front of struggle among the Negro people. The programme of the National Negro Congress must be realized."

INT'L PRESS CORRESP. Vol. 16 No. 7 Feb. 1st, 1936
The Negro Movement - A National Negro Cong. in America pp. 195
(The article quoted above was published before the N.N.C. was held.)

The National Negro Congress was to be only one part of a Kremlin plotted world wide organization of negroes which was to have followed the formation of the N.N.C. Negro communist agents were sent throughout the world to inflame negroes (particularly in Africa) and to weld them into an international force serving the Soviet purposes. During the same year that the N.N.C. was formed and the call was issued through the Negro Congress for a "class conscious" organization to be called the "International Congress of Negroes", Ralph Bunche went to Africa and toured large areas of that continent. An investigation should be made to determine if Bunche had contact with some of the Negro agitators who are stirring up trouble and bloodshed in Africa today.

"Hence, the National Negro Congress in the United States occupies an important place in the life and struggles of Negroes everywhere. That is why the Congress adopted a resolution on an International Congress of Negroes, as follows:

Whereas, the exploitation and subjugation of the Negro masses is general, and world-wide in scope, and Negro toilers in one nation are not free so long as their brother toilers elsewhere are subjected to the degrading horrors of exploitation, and

Whereas, a deeper sympathy and class-consciousness of all Negroes throughout the world can best be developed by an International Congress of Negroes, be it

Resolved, that immediately upon the establishment of this Congress upon a permanent basis, it work for the fulfillment of such an International Congress of Negroes."

Political Highlights of the National Negro Congress by James W. Ford

The following message to the leadership of the National Negro Congress demonstrates beyond any doubt that the function of that organization is to follow in the footsteps of the Soviet Revolution. This quote incidently is from the INTERNATIONAL PRESS CORRESPONDENCE which only prints that which was cleared by top Soviet Leaders:-

"The history of the Soviet Union from the day of its birth is replete with lessons of utmost value to the National Negro Congress. These lessons can be an invaluable aid in the solution of every problem confronting the Congress, for the peoples of the Soviet Union have passed through just such struggles and have solved them."

The Negro Movement - A National Negro Congress in America

The nature of the National Negro Congress has been thoroughly probed by various governmental investigating agencies and they all have recognized its subversive character. The following taken from the House Committee on Un-American Activities in 1951 "Guide to Subversive Organizations and Publications" page 86, sums up the investigations and testimony on the National Negro Congress:-

"NATIONAL NEGRO CONGRESS

1. Cited as subversive and Communist.
(Attorney General Tom Clark, letters to Loyalty Review Board, released December 4, 1947, and September 21, 1948.)

2. A. Philip Randolph, president of the Congress since its inception in 1936, refused to run again in April 1940 on the ground that it was 'deliberately packed with Communists and Congress of Industrial Organizations members who were either Communists or sympathizers with Communists.'

Commencing with its formation in 1936, Communist Party functionaries and 'fellow travelers' have figured prominently in the leadership and affairs of the Congress  according to A. Philip Randolph, John P. Davis, secretary of the congress has admitted that the Communist Party contributed $100 a month to its support.

From the record of its activities and the composition of its governing bodies, there can be little doubt that it has served as what James W. Ford, Communist Vice Presidential candidate elected to the executive committee in 1937, predicted: 'An important sector of the democratic front,' sponsored and supported by the Communist Party."

3. "The Communist-front movement in the United States among Negroes is known as the National Negro Congress. The officers of the National Negro Congress are outspoken Communist sympathizers, and a majority of those on the executive board are outright communists."

(Special Committee on Un-American Activities, Report, January 3, 1939, p. 81; also cited, Reports, January 3, 1940, p. 9; June 25, 1942, p. 20; and March 29, 1944, p. 180.)

4. A "Communist-dominated mass organization."

(California Committee on Un-American Activities, Report, 1947, p. 230.)

5. William Z. Foster, chairman of the Communist Party, U.S.A. stated that the role of his party was 'one of central importance in the organization of the great united front National Negro Congress in Chicago, February 1936.'

(Massachusetts House Committee on Un-American Activities, Report, 1938, p. 298.)

(Guide to Subversive Organizations and publications May 14, 1951)"

The reason for the lengthy analysis of the Negro Congress and the role of Dr. Bunche should be obvious by this time. Here is a man who has dealt in terms of a class conscious struggle of the workers allied with the Negro population against our system of society. At the same time he has pointed towards the Soviet Union as the example for the American Negroes to follow. He advocates a class war against our social order (on a world basis) and inveighs against the system of private ownership and free enterprise. During this exact same period (1935-36) he is a leader in a Soviet directed move to organize the National Negro Congress.

At the same time there was a manifestation from openly communist sources praising Bunche for his views and activities. First, there was the high praise by official red sources of his pamphlet "The World View of Race" and then there were several tributes given him for his "outstanding participation" as one of the "notables" who gave birth to the Negro Congress. His election to the governing national body of the National Negro Congress, where Bunche served with some of the most prominent communists of the day, ties in the accepted rule of the Kremlin that only the most trusted lieutenants of World communism can be allowed to plot out such of its vital activities as an organization which is to serve as the wedge to turn twelve million negroes against its own government.

A COMMUNIST PUBLICATION (SCIENCE AND SOCIETY AND DR. BUNCHE)

During the winter of 1935 there appeared a magazine called "SCIENCE AND SOCIETY - A MARXIAN QUARTERLY". (Vol. I No. 1 Winter of 1935-36)

This publication appeared stating that it intended to influence members of the academic world and those in the technical fields as well. The fact that this magazine announced on its front cover that it was a Marxian publication was an open admission to the world that it was dedicated to the Marxian principles of class struggle and revolution against existing society.

Ralph J. Bunche was listed in the first issue of SCIENCE AND SOCIETY as a contributing editor and his name continued on the covers of that magazine until 1940.

Dr. Bunche had an interesting accompaniment of Marxist revolutionaries on the editorial listing of the magazine. They included such communist luminaries as follows:-

J. D. Bernal - A publicly known British communist from Cambridge University.

Paul Langevin	- A top level member of the French Communist Party who upon his death was publicly lauded for his "dedication to communism."
Joseph Needham	- A British professor who has led in the Soviet charge accusing the United States of germ warfare in Korea.
W. P. Parry	- He was managing editor of SCIENCE AND SOCIETY when Bunche first appeared as contributing editor. Parry was director of the communist progressive labor school in Boston. Appearing before the Un-American Activities Committee he refused to answer whether he was or has been a communist.
Vladimir D. Kazakevich	- When about to be arrested for deportation as a communist he fled this country and returned to his native Russia. In testimony before the McCarran committee, probing the communist connections of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Elizabeth Bentley said that Kazakevich handed over information to Jacob Golos, Soviet spy chief, with the knowledge that this was going to Soviet Russia.

There are a score of other names which include known members of the Communist Party or those who refused to answer questions as to such membership before investigating committees.

In the issue of Summer 1939 (Vol. 3, No. 3) the statement of ownership bears the name of A. A. Heller as Business Manager of SCIENCE AND SOCIETY.

Alexander Trachtenberg, well known communist leader, testified in September 1939 before the House Committee on Un-American Activities that A. A. Heller was the President and listed owner of International Publishers, the publishing organization of the Communist Party. This firm was required by the Government to register as a foreign agency representing the Soviet Union in the publishing field in the United States.

Trachtenberg also admitted that right after the Bolshevik Revolution, Lenin gave Heller the oxygen concession in the Soviet Union and that Heller introduced the acetylene industry into Russia. Trachtenberg also stated that Heller was a member of the Communist Party of the U.S.A.

In the excellently documented Lusk Committee Reports of Red Activities in New York State in 1920 A. A. Heller is listed as an official of the Soviet Government in the United States.

A listing and analysis of the Communist articles and the Soviet propaganda in SCIENCE AND SOCIETY would take up a prohibitive amount of space in this report. The fact that this is a communist magazine is obvious even on a superficial perusal of the publication.

After SCIENCE AND SOCIETY was in existence for one year the top Marxist-Leninist theoretician in the top levels of the Communist Party made an evaluation of the work of that magazine in the pages of the chief publication of the Communist Party known as "THE COMMUNIST!"

V. J. Jerome, the communist writer of this article wanted to make certain that the use of the word Marxist by this magazine would not be confused with other claimants to Marxism who did not adhere to the interpretations of those principles by the Kremlin. Jerome clarified the position of SCIENCE AND SOCIETY in this respect by pointing out that its function was to interpret Marxism in accordance with "The Party of Marxism, The Communist Party, inheritor of the proletarian party which Marx and Engels founded in their day". The following quote also makes plain the fact that this magazine is an instrument for communism in educational circles both for students and instructors:-

"Indeed, these constant rude interruptions by the proletariat interfere with the efforts of these philosophers to accommodate Marxism, groomed and respectabilized, to bourgeois and petty-bourgeois theories, such as the instrumentalism of Dewey, latest crusader in the cause of Trotskyism, or to the equally fashionable psycho-analysis of Freud.

Then, of course, there are the super-ultra Marxists of Socialism now or never, a cloak for counter-revolutionary Trotskyism. Their poison infects certain petty-bourgeois elements whose 'impatience' with the Soviet Union and the world proletariat is but a protective mask to cover their indisposition to toil for the revolution as the workers toil, by meeting practical problems in daily struggle.

Naturally, such brands of 'Marxism,' ideologies of reaction, leave out of reckoning-except for slander-the Party of Marxism, the Communist Party, inheritor of the proletarian Party which Marx and Engels founded in their day, political leader of the proletarian class which is the historic carrier of the Marxian objective-socialism.

These anti-Communist 'Marxists' seem to say of the Communists: Let them occupy themselves with the unemployed, with strikes and demonstrations, with united fronts and other such mundane things; we will take care of the Absolute Idea of Marxism.

With such factors as these to contend with, the Marxist magazine, Science and Society, was launched a little over a year ago. It entered the arena with an important and complex task to perform: to help Marxward moving students and intellectuals to come closer to Marxism-Leninism; to bring Communist thought into academic circles and to develop contributors from these circles; to stimulate the study of Marxism-Leninism by demonstrating the integration of Communist theory and practice with American social life; to apply the dialectic-materialist analysis to the natural and social sciences, and to cultural processes as a whole."

THE COMMUNIST December 1937 Vol. XVI. No. 12 Pages 1148-9
Marxism-Leninism for Society and Science by V. J. Jerome

Jerome further stresses the fact that the purpose of SCIENCE AND SOCIETY is to proceed on the premise that Marxism is "revolutionary Marxism", and impartiality is unthinkable because they are out to "realize their full role in the movement to achieve the Marxist-Leninist objectives". These objectives, as the whole world knows, is to capture all of society for the Soviet Masters:-

"The editors of such a magazine, however, have the important task of Marxist-Leninist study, in order to deepen their own understanding and provide leadership. Proceeding from the principle that Marxism is revolutionary Marxism, that it must continue to affirm its scientific theory and practice through unceasing struggle against open opponents and subtle perverters, their task is to help their readers overcome college-fostered misconceptions of Communism; depart from idealistic notions of history and from stultifying mechanical materialism; give up, in the face of objective truth, all remaining traces of the liberalistic 'both-sides-of-the-question' attitude; throw overboard the treacherous bourgeois instrumentalism; and realize their full role in the movement to achieve the Marxist-Leninist objectives."

Marxism-Leninism for Society and Science by V. J. Jerome

That this was no mere academic journal but a means towards bringing about a revolution is clearly pointed out in the next excerpt. The concluding phrase which declares that "Science and Society" can be a "revolutionary weapon to fight a war and win it" demonstrates the motives and impelling character of the publication:-

"This magazine of Marxian scholarship can refute the notion that theory may in any way be scientific apart from practice; it can fuse learning with the vital flow of action. It can present the proletarian revolution and the Soviet socialist system, not as an 'experiment'...'purely Russian,' but as the inevitable outcome of the class struggle with international significance and application. It can demonstrate that Marxism for academic circles is in no way academic Marxism; that it is not a pacific, scholastic affair, but a scientific, revolutionary weapon to fight a war and win it."

Marxism-Leninism for Society and Science by V. J. Jerome

In the next issue of the COMMUNIST (January 1937) Jerome devotes a second article reflecting directives in respect to SCIENCE AND SOCIETY. Here he expresses in communist language the instruction that this magazine is required reading for all communists and their followers:-

"We have stated earlier, and we wish to reaffirm at the conclusion, the considerable achievements of the magazine, its auspicious beginnings, and the hopeful prospects for its realization of the purposes the editors have set for it. On the basis of its efforts and of its realizations to date, Science and Society is deserving of the fullest support of the Communist Party and of all progressives."

Marxism-Leninism for Society and Science by V. J. Jerome

In the following quote, which concludes Jerome's article the frank admission that SCIENCE AND SOCIETY is designed to perform the work in the United States "of the similarly-purposed Soviet periodical, UNDER THE BANNER OF MARXISM;" which followed the dictates of no other than Lenin:-

"But the very emergence of Science and Society implies a conscious purpose to transform science into an instrument for re-fashioning society. So it is fitting to remember Lenin's counsel to the editors of the similarly-purposed Soviet periodical, Under the Banner of Marxism; that 'a magazine that desires to be an organ of militant materialism must be a militant organ'."

Marxism-Leninism for Society and Science by V. J. Jerome

In considering Bunche's serving as contributing editor of SCIENCE AND SOCIETY it must be remembered that he appeared in that capacity in the very first issue. The same rule applies to communist publications that it does to communistic organizations i.e. only the most trusted and reliable partisans are to be placed in positions of responsibility, especially at the beginning. Today there is no doubt that SCIENCE AND SOCIETY was and is a Soviet inspired publication. Naturally during its origin only the most trusted hard-core adherents of communism were assigned to its editorship.

In the issue of Summer 1936, Bunche wrote a review of a printed work on minority problems and criticized it for not stressing the class nature of the status and problems of minority groups. Here again Bunche repeats the standard communist line that all minority groups should be fit into the class-struggle pattern.

During the hearings on the loyalty of Dr. Bunche, during May, 1954, before the International Organization Loyalty Board, it has been reported that Bunche read a letter that he had sent to the Editors of SCIENCE AND SOCIETY explaining that other duties prevented him from further serving and wishing them success in their future endeavors.

In concluding the section on SCIENCE AND SOCIETY and the activities of Bunche in that publication, herewith is the evaluation of it by official investigative bodies:-

DR. BUNCHE'S ACTIVITIES SINCE 1940

During 1939-1940 many Jewish and Negro persons defected from the Communist Party because of the Hitler-Stalin pact. Negroes in the Communist Party found it hard to swallow the Nazis as new found friends, especially in view of Molotov's remark that "fascism was a matter of taste." Hitler's categorizing the Negro race in a slanderous manner - relegating them into a sub-human classification - made the new line of friendship with the Nazis hard for communist Negroes to reconcile with the previous communist position. As a result many Negroes left the Communist Party. Most of them gravitated back after Russia was invaded and the entire Stalin-Nazi Alliance was explained away as just another clever Soviet maneuver to gain time to prepare for the onslaught.

Bunche was one of those who defected. In the Gunnar-Myrdal Carnegie studies in 1940, Bunche criticized the Communist Party and particularly laid stress on those communist policies which came about as a result of the pact with Hitler.

However within 90 days after Hitler invaded Soviet Russia, Bunche was appointed to the Colonial Division of the Office of Strategic Services. He states in an autobiographical article that he received this appointment as the result of a recommendation by Professor Charles McIlwain, who was professor Emeritus of Harvard and one of Bunche's former instructors. Professor McIlwain has a communist front record. (Reference: Appendix IX House Un-American Activities Committee Report, March 1944, page 380.) If Bunche had continued his separation from the communist movement it is hard to see why a person with communist front connections would interest himself to suggest Bunche for the position. Secondly there is the fact that the O.S.S. was a highly infiltrated government agency by the communists and their followers. A great deal of public and secret testimony has proven this to be an incontrovertible fact as illustrated by the following Senate Report:-

"Network in National Defense

In its decision of April 20, 1953, the Subversive Activities Control Board found that the Communist Party, USA, had as its objective 'the overthrow of the United States Government' and the effectuation of policies 'for the purposes of defending and protecting the Soviet Union.' Toward this end, the penetration of key agencies engaged in national defense was paramount. With the limited resources and data available to the subcommittee, we have been able to indicate only the pattern of such infiltration by those who have invoked their privilege against incrimination when asked about the subcommittee's evidence of their Communist Party membership."

"The subcommittee was in no position to make any overall investigation of the agencies mentioned. The following data, therefore, was purely incidental and does not depict the full situation."

"The Office of Strategic Services, the United States intelligence agency operating abroad during World War II, and discussed previously, included within its ranks the following such individuals: Leo M. Drozdoff, Irving Fajans, Maurice Halperin (Chief of the Latin American Division), Jack Sargeant Harris (in charge of military intelligence of South Africa), Julius J. Joseph, Paul V. Martineau, Carl Aldo Marzani (Deputy Chief of the Presentation Branch), Leonard E. Mins, Helen B. Tenney, Milton Wolff, and George S. Wuchinich."

Interlocking Subversion in Government Departments
Senate Sub-Committee on Internal Security
July 30, 1953 pages 35-36

The Jack Sargeant Harris mentioned in the above Senate report as being in charge of military intelligence of the South African Section of OSS (Bunche was the Chief of the African Section) later figured in a probe of his activity on behalf of the Soviets and the fact that Bunche had recommended him for the job.

In spite of the high degree of communist influence in the O.S.S. Bunche was promoted and in 1942 he was elevated to chief of the O.S.S. African

Section. (It must be remembered that a few years previously Bunche had toured Africa and had written articles on the basis of his travels against "Imperialist Capitalism, Class Struggle," etc.)

In 1943 Bunche was transferred to the State Department during the heyday of the Alger Hiss influence. Again it is inconceivable that one remaining anti-communist, having been in the communist camp previously, could have received such a job when the communist agents were riding hard on even those who had been entrenched in the State Department for years.

Bunche stayed in the State Department for three years working on his old specialty "Colonial questions". Bunche was an advisor at the Dunbarton Oaks conference and at the first U. N. session at San Francisco and was an advisor at both the Council of Foreign Ministers and the U. N. General Assembly. These movements as to locale followed closely that of Alger Hiss.

Early in 1946 Bunche went to work at the United Nations, first on loan from the State Department and later permanently as director of the UN Trusteeship Division.

It is a fact that those who had been through the communist movement and have remained opponents of their former "comrades" are generally castigated and vilified by the red apparatus without let up. It is also a fact that such defectors can easily recognize or spot another communist. There is no truce between former partisans of the communist cause and the official communist machine. It is a matter of official record that Bunche sponsored a communist to a key post in the UN. In fact this communist had received an award of $40,000 in lieu of reinstatement from the UN after he had refused to answer as to whether or not he had been and was a communist. The pertinent testimony on this question before the Jenner Committee of the United States Senate is as follows:-

"Mr. Morris. Now later, on December 11, 1945 did you state to the State Department official that you had applied for this position at the suggestion of Mr. Ralph Bunche?

"Mr. Harris. My answer remains the same, Mr. Morris, I decline to reply.

"Mr. Morris. And did you state to the State Department official that Ralph Bunche and Mr. John Ross, of the Special Political Affairs Committee, had told you that you were the best man for the job?

"Mr. Harris. I must decline to answer that on the grounds stated, Mr. Morris.
(Activities of United States Citizens Employed by the United Nations.) page 654 October 2, 1953

"Mr. Morris. On December 11, 1945, did you again write defending your record and complaining that you had not been told of the charges against you, and stating again that you had been invited to apply by Dr. Ralph Bunche in the first place?

"Mr. Harris. The same reply."

"Mr. Morris. Do you know, Mr. Harris, that after your clearance with personnel for this P-6 appointment that the Security Office in the State Department disapproved of your appointment?

"Mr. Harris. I also decline to answer that question on the same grounds.

"Mr. Morris. Do you know there was a memorandum prepared by the security official pointing out that there was strong evidence that you had been a Communist at least up to 1938?

"Mr. Harris. I must decline to answer that questior also, Mr. Morris.

"Mr. Morris. Do you know that Mr. John Ross was notified on November 1, 1945, about the decision of the security people in the State Department who again urged your appointment on the ground that Dr. Ralph Bunche knew you well and had cabled to that effect from London?

"Mr. Harris. The same reply. I decline to answer on the same grounds.

"Mr. Morris. What ground?

"Mr. Harris. On all the grounds mentioned.

"Mr. Morris. And among others, the fifth amendment?"

"Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, I have a copy here of the administrative tribunal's decision, and it does read that the tribunal did award $40,000 in lieu of reinstatement to Mr. Harris.

"One of the factors they mentioned here, Mr. Chairman, is item (c), the fact that he joined the United Nations at the special request of Mr. Ralph Bunche, Director of the Trusteeship Division, thereby terminating his previous career.

"Now, Mr. Harris, did you, as a matter of fact, join the United Nations at the special request of Mr. Ralph Bunche?

"Mr. Harris. The answer, Mr. Morris, as I stated previously in the executive session is "Yes".

"Mr. Morris. Will you give us the circumstances of your joining the United Nations at the special request of Mr. Ralph Bunche?

"Mr. Boudin. May the witness be permitted to state several objections to this question, and then may it be deemed that the objections now stated will be applied to any other questions he wishes to decline to answer, without repeating them?

"Mr. Morris. Yes.

"Mr. Harris. Sir, I decline to answer the question on the ground that:....."

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS & BUNCHE

One of the main channels of Soviet espionage and communist betrayal of China into the hands of the Reds has been the Institute of Pacific Relations. The American Council of the I.P.R. is studded with the names of Soviet agents, red partisans and sympathizers who managed to secure a grip on various government departments which included our State Department, the White House, the Treasury Department, the Office of Strategic Services, and who have been variously charged with stealing Government documents, spying for Soviet Russia, and for perverting American Foreign and domestic policy to fit the Soviet aims to prepare the ground to seize control of the whole world.

Ralph Bunche was a high official of the Institute of Pacific Relations. More than this, he rubbed elbows and entered into close and private conference in respect to matters involving our National Policy with subsequently known Soviet agents and convicted communist operatives.

In respect to the I.P.R. and its communist manipulations, Alfred Kohlberg, a member of that organization for almost 20 years, presented evidence before the Jenner sub-committee of the COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, THE UNITED STATES SENATE, and swore to the following facts:-

"Since 1944 I have learned much more about the IPR; its apparently completely Communist or pro-Communist staff; that all articles on Far Eastern politics are written by Communists or pro-communists (some articles on economic, scientific, geographic questions are not); and that it has ties through interlocking directorates or staff with various Communist or pro-Communist organizations."

"Through its influence in the staffing of the State Department, Army and Navy Intelligence, and Far Eastern Divisions of UNRRA, of OWI, and even General MacArthur's staff, our Institute has put considerable numbers of Communists and pro-Communists where they could and have done the most possible harm and spread the most confusion."

"It would be my intention to present first to this Investigating Committee witnesses, and by witnesses I mean more than one, who would testify that the Institute of Pacific Relations is considered by the National Committee of the Communist Party to be one of its organizations and that certain of the Executive Committee of the American Institute are members of the Communist Party."

"Since that time numerous qualified witnesses have testified under oath before the McCarran Committee that:

"1. Your organization constantly and deliberately followed the Communist line in its publications.

"2. Some espionage activities were carried on.

"3. More than forty of your staff, Trustees and writers were actual Communists, or espionage agents, or both, and others learned that way.

"4. That activities in infiltrating our government by such people were carried on both officially and unofficially in your name."

Mr. Kohlberg also brought out the fact that the I.P.R. was involved in the gigantic espionage scandal of pilfered State Department documents which were seized by government agents in the offices of the "AMERASIA" magazine and for which the editor of that magazine Philip Jaffe (well known Soviet agent) was convicted. Mr. Kohlberg swore that:-

"Four of the six persons arrested in the Amerasia case were connected with the IPR."

A former official of the Soviet Government in testifying before the McCarran Senate Committee stated that:-

"In 1933 Soviet Military Intelligence officers used the 'Institute' (meaning the IPR - Ed.) as 'cover' for obtaining secret military intelligence".

The extent of Bunche's importance to the pro-Soviet group in the IPR is demonstrated in the following communication from the head of the American group, E. C. Carter, to W. W. Lockwood as to possible delegates to the International IPR conference in Mont Tremblant, Canada.

"In response to your request I have hastily jotted down a number of suggestions for the American group at the conference. It's a long list, of course, but I believe we should add to it considerably and then get competent advice-say that of Currie, Barnes, and Jessup-on elimination. This list runs too much in the regular groove as regards non-government people. So far as Washington is concerned, we need more intimate knowledge as to who really are in the key positions."

In the long list which followed the communication there were included the following:-

Ralph Bunche
Joseph Davies (Mission to Moscow)
Alger Hiss (Soviet Spy)
Laughlin Currie (Named by Elizabeth Bentley as connected with Soviet spy ring)
Frederick Vanderbilt Field (convicted communist agent)
Philip Jessup (accused of following communist line)
Harry Dexter White (Spy exposed by the Attorney General of U.S. and Edgar Hoover of FBI)
Henry A. Wallace (Former head of Communist led Progressive Party)
Joseph Barnes (Identified as a member of the Communist Party)
Benjamin Kizer (Identified as a member of the Communist Party)

The final list of delegates as sifted through by Laughlin Currie (accused as spy for Soviets), Joseph Barnes (identified as communist) and listed above along with Bunche were:-

Frank Coe (Cited as Soviet spy)

Len DeCaux (identified as an important communist)
Harriet L. Moore (E. Bentley testified that spy chief Golos told her Miss Moore was one of their people)

There were a number of other delegates like Mrs. Ogden Reid, who were picked either as window dressing or were so surrounded by the communist agents that they could not effectively make their opinions prevail. It was a completely staged communist show.

At the end of the IPR Canadian conference E. C. Carter, the head of the American IPR, wrote to Jessup as follows:-

Dr. Philip C. Jessup
Columbia University
New York, N. Y.

Dear Phil:

Here are the rapporteurs' reports for the last group of Round Tables. I think you will be particularly interested in the reports of Harriet Moore, Fred Field, and Ralph Bunche.....

Sincerely yours,
Edward C. Carter

The linking up by the head of the I.P.R. of a report by Bunche along with Harriet Moore and F. V. Field (exposed as Soviet agents) is significant in itself. It is obvious that the three reports mentioned above are recommended as a distillation of this communist dominated conference.

In a 1943 communication of the IPR, Bunche is listed as a member of a private discussion group which included the usual pro-Soviet stalwarts such as Frank Coe, Len DeCaux and David Weintraub (there were 43 derogatory FBI reports on Weintraub as to red activity and he resigned under fire from the U.N.)

At the 1945 International conference of the IPR, Bunche was accompanied as delegate by the usual names of Frank Coe, Len DeCaux, Frederick Vanderbilt Field and Philip Jessup and by the additional names of John Carter Vincent (who was accused of aiding in the sell out of China to the Reds) and Owen Lattimore who is now under indictment.

At the end of 1944 it became obvious to the Kremlin leaders that Japan was on the verge of surrender. Therefore orders were issued to communist agents all over the world to concentrate on preparing the groundwork for the seizure of China by the reds. The preliminary phase was to create the condition whereby the Chiang Kai-shek Government was to be criticized for the internal situation in China. Almost continuous war in Chinese territory since 1937 had naturally created havoc with the internal life of the country. Therefore by harping on demands for reforms and conditions which were impossible of realization, the reds managed to create and channel dissatisfaction against the Chinese government.

In the United States the Communist agents were to influence official government bodies, especially the State Department, to force the Chinese Government to adopt reform measures and make concessions to the reds which would pave the way for seizure of China by Soviet forces.

The IPR was the major instrument used by the Kremlin to do this job. The following official conclusions by a Senate committee were published on this matter as follows:-

"It was the continued practice of IPR to seek to place in Government posts both persons associated with IPR and other persons selected by the effective leadership of IPR."

* * * *

"The effective leadership of the IPR used IPR prestige to promote the interests of the Soviet Union in the United States."

* * * *

"The IPR was a vehicle used by the Communists to orientate American far eastern policies toward Communist objectives."

RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE INTERNAL SECURITY OF THE UNITED STATES BY THE INTERNAL SECURITY SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE June 20, 1952 pp. 223-4

On October 28, 1944 there was held a preliminary conference of the American Delegates of the IPR in preparing to drag the internal situation of China into a forthcoming international IPR conference where Chinese delegates from the Chinese Government would be present. This small meeting was made up of persons who were predominantly Soviet agents and communist partisans as listed previously in this report. There was only one person present who fought the communist line at this conference in respect to the Chinese question. This was Admiral Yarnell. The testimony and documents on this meeting before the Senate Sub Committee on Internal Security was as follows:-

"Mr. Morris. Who else gave their opinions at this conference?
"Mr. Mandel. We have here a digest of the opinion of Mr. Dennett, Admiral Yarnell, Mr. Chase, and Mr. Field.
"Mr. Dennett. I don't recall. He wasn't in the delegation, I don't think. I don't know who Mr. Chase was.
"Mr. Morris. Who was Mr. Field?
"Mr. Dennett. Frederick Vanderbilt Field.
"Mr. Mandel. Mr. Coe.
"Mr. Morris. Who was Mr. Coe?
"Mr. Dennett. Frank Coe.
"Mr. Mandel. Miss Farley.
"Mr. Morris. Who is Miss Farley?
"Mr. Dennett. Miriam Farley.
"Mr. Mandel. Mr. Johnstone.
"Mr. Morris. Who is Mr. Johnstone?
"Mr. Dennett. William C. Johnstone.
"Mr. Mandel. Mr. Bunche.
"Mr. Dennett. That is Ralph Bunche.
"Mr. Mandel. Mr. DeCaux.
"Mr. Morris. Is that Len DeCaux?
"Mr. Dennett. Yes.
"Mr. Morris. As far as you can recall, what was the purpose of that advance session?
"Mr. Dennett. I think it is well described by the statement of the chairman; that is, to see what the attitudes of the members of the delegation were, many of them strangers to each other, and to discuss particularly at this session the degree to which it would be possible to examine as part of the discussions the internal developments in China.
"Mr. Morris. Have you read that through completely?
"Mr. Dennett. I have read this through. There are a lot of others I have not read, however.
"Mr. Morris. With the exception of Admiral Yarnell, would you not agree there was uniformity of opinion there?
"Mr. Dennett. I think that is a fair statement; yes.
"Mr. Morris. What was the underlying expression of this majority of people there with the exception of Admiral Yarnell, with respect to the Chinese question?
"Mr. Dennett. The underlying agreement was that we certainly should discuss the internal situation in China as it bore very definitely upon postwar situations in China.

Admiral Yarnell's position is, I think, best summarized in one statement, and I am quoting:

> 'But if criticism leads to the overthrow of the Chungking Government, what will take its place? No other party is strong enough at present to assume control.'

"Mr. Morris. Nobody agreed with him?
"Mr. Dennett. They seemed not to."

The above testimony was based upon an official IPR minutes of this meeting which was as follows:-

"The main point under discussion during this period of the morning's meeting was what the American attitude should be in regard to the discussion of the internal problems of China, at the Hot Springs conference. Mr. Jessup felt that if the American delegation could decide what slant to take in bringing forth a discussion of China's domestic difficulties, it would facilitate a free discussion of this problem at the conference. He pointed out that the Chinese delegates have not wished and will not wish to discuss the internal situation in China. The domestic Chinese situation is covered in an indirect way in the agenda of the conference, as a diplomatic concession. He then asked Mr. Lattimore what factors in the Chinese internal situation were likely to come under discussion at the conference."

"Mr. Lattimore: He thought that the method of including India as well as China in the topic on the agenda might cushion the Chinese discussion. He said that the Chinese delegation at Hot Springs may occupy the position formerly held by the Japanese delegation at IPR conferences. The Chinese will present the party line, well cloaked in fog, and individual members of the Chinese party will hew to the party line although they may differ from it as individuals. They won't care to speak of their differences of opinion. Owing to the scarcity of information about Chinese internal affairs, the discussion at Hot Springs is likely to boil down to a discussion of the Kuomintang and the Communists, although the actual situation is far more complex; there are many smaller groups who are playing active parts in the political picture whose roles will be ignored. Developments in China today will have important political consequences. One example: the developments in southeast China, with the United States getting closer and closer to the Chinese coast. China's military leaders may decide to break through the Japanese lines to commandeer United States equipment when we land. The political affiliation of the Chinese commander who might make this move would influence the whole political set-up. The Chinese delegation will present no real data on China's internal situation, even though this situation is of military as well as political importance in the whole international picture."

Page 991 * * * *

"Admiral Yarnell: But if criticism leads to the overthrow of the Chungking government, what will take its place? No other party is strong enough at present to assume control."

Page 992 * * * *

"Mr. Bunche: How can we divorce national policies from domestic conditions? We cannot avoid discussing internal conditions in China in relation to her future foreign policy, and all other countries as well."

Page 993 * * * *

"Mr. Bunche thought that under section C-I of the agenda, Dumbarton Oaks should play an important part. And also he brought out the fact that a United Nations conference might take place before the Hot Springs meeting, and that too should be included in the agenda."

Dr. Bunche, as the above remarks indicate, proposed the line which the Kremlin wanted, to prepare the ground work for the seizure of China by red forces. Thus the IPR was used to swing U.S. foreign policy behind Soviet objectives. The preliminary move was to trick the Chiang Kai-shek government, through our State Department pressure, to allow the reds more lee-way in the internal affairs of China. In a weakened war-torn country this was all the foot hold the Moscow trained reds needed.

It is interesting to note that in his last statement Bunche asked that the IPR forces be injected in helping shape the future of the United Nations.

It is hard to believe that one who has been trained and experience in advanced communist propaganda and theory (as indicated in Dr. Bunche's earlier writings and associations) could do these things in the company of Soviet Agents and oppose Admiral Yarnell's pro-American position, without realizing the serious traitorous consequences of the preparations for betrayal of China to Moscow.

After sifting through thousands of seized IPR documents and hearing the testimony of numerous witnesses on the activities of this organization, a Senate sub-Committee arrived at the following conclusions as to the nature of its pro-Soviet character:-

"The IPR has been considered by the American Communist Party and by Soviet Officials as an instrument of Communist policy, propaganda and military intelligence."

* * * *

"The IPR disseminated and sought to popularize false information including information originating from Soviet and Communist sources."

* * * *

"Members of the small core of officials and staff members who controlled IPR were either Communist or pro-Communist."

* * * *

"Effective leadership of the IPR had by the end of 1934, established and implemented an official connection with G. N. Voitinski, Chief of the Far Eastern Division of the Communist International."

* * * *

"A group of persons associated with the IPR attempted, between 1941 and 1945, to change United States policy so as to accommodate Communist ends and to set the stage for a major United States policy change, favorable to Soviet interests, in 1945."

* * * *

"During the period 1945-49, persons associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations were instrumental in keeping United States policy on a course favorable to Communist objectives in China."

* * * *

"The net effect of IPR activities on United States public opinion has been such as to serve international Communist interests and to affect adversely the interests of the United States."

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, EIGHTY-SECOND CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION, PURSUANT TO S. RES. 366 (82nd Congress) A RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE INTERNAL SECURITY OF THE UNITED STATES. HEARINGS HELD JULY 25, 1951-JUNE 20, 1952 BY THE INTERNAL SECURITY SUBCOMMITTEE pages 223-4-5

STOCKHOLM PEACE APPEAL

The main Soviet line during the last few years has been to set up a barrage of activity to disarm the non-communist world by a so-called "peace" drive. The main instrument in this endeavor has been the self-styled

"Stockholm Peace" drive with which the Kremlin intends to build up pressure to disarm their opponents throughout the rest of the world, while the red drive towards subversion and conquest is to go right on without a letup.

In a Soviet organized movement, called the "Committee of the World Congress of the Defenders of Peace", (which in turn was promoted by an organization called the "World Peace Council", which is located behind the Iron Curtain in Warsaw, Poland.) there is published a well known Soviet publication called WORLD REVIEW IN DEFENSE OF PEACE. The acknowledged head of this enterprise is M. Frederick Joliot-Curie, a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of France.

In this magazine, Dr. Bunche is referred to in the most complimentary terms and his speeches are quoted as reflecting the line which fits into the propaganda issued by the Soviet organized "Stockholm Peace" Appeal. The following quote of the complete text amply illustrates this:

"The Stockholm appeal continued to progress. The banning of the atom bomb and control of that ban appear more and more as an imperative necessity. Dr. Ralph Bunche, head of the United Nations Trusteeship Division and winner of the 1950 Nobel Prize for Peace, warned listeners at Western University where he received an honorary degree last month that:

"'If the United Nations cannot keep peace, there will be war-catastrophic, final, atomic war. A war, perhaps the final war, in which there may be survivors but none who dare boast of themselves as victors.'

"Dr. Bunche repeated his warning to a meeting of the Canadian United Nations Association in Toronto:

"'The road ahead is not inviting ... it will not be easily traversed. But, it will be more easily undertaken if the peoples of the West and the East come to believe that in the atomic weapons they have a common enemy.'

"Dr. Bunche warned against the idea of reorganizing the United Nations with Russia excluded. He said:

"'This idea misses the fundamental concept of the U.N. We do not propose to choose up sides for an ultimate fight but to have all nations in ... particularly those who have differences among themselves.'

"He criticized the slogan 'cold war' and said emphasis should be on winning peace, and expressed his opinion that a peaceful means of settling major disputes is possible."

An official Congressional evaluation of this communist peace organization lists it as:-

WORLD PEACE COUNCIL (See also Second World Peace Congress)
1. Cited as having been formed at the conclusion of the Second World Peace Congress in Warsaw and which was heralded by the Moscow radio as "the expression of the determination of the peoples to take into their own hands the struggle for peace."

THE DAILY WORKER

Finally, the Official Communist newspaper, THE DAILY WORKER, gave full support to Dr. Bunche, during the obviously inadequate "quickie" hearing held before the Government Loyalty Board during May of 1954.

In an editorial on the Bunche case, this communist newspaper was almost hysterical in support of him. (It is a long established fact, supported by expert testimony, that the top polit-buro of the Communist Party must pass on the text of all editorials of THE DAILY WORKER):-

"DR. BUNCHE'S CASE
"The UN was getting ready to appoint Dr. Ralph J. Bunche to a new high post when certain racist 'anti-Communist' forces moved fast to stop this.

"This is the obvious explanation of the fact that two sordid characters making a profession of 'fingering Communists' were quickly dragged out of the cellar to knife Bunche.

"And so Dr. Bunche again had to solemnly prove his 'loyalty' - meaning that he had to prove he is innocent of the 'crime' of Marxism and is a reliable supporter of the 'anti-Communist' policy.

"The plans of the 'anti-Communists' who could not stomach the idea of a Negro in top UN posts couldn't be carried through. The same enormous anti-racist pressure which in the U.S.A. and throughout the world, compelled the Supreme Court to declare segregated schools and housing un-Constitutional also blocked this scheme.

"But what was revealed again was the un-American machinery of the 'anti-Communist' frameup mill. Bunche, thanks to the new anti-racist upsurge, escaped but the same McCarthyite machine hounds and jails hundreds of innocent Americans. Two stool pigeons not only lied about Dr. Bunche - this type of FBI 'anti-Communist' stoolie has been lying to courts and juries for more than five years; their lies have served as the basis for the 'red menace', Smith Act jailings and McCarthy's '20 years of treason' forgeries.

"It is good that the attempted political knifing of Dr. Bunche was balked; but America's safety requires that the Big Lie about Communism which the political assassins tried to use against him be discarded for the forgery it is."

DAILY WORKER - Editorial, Monday, May 31, 1954. P. 5

There is one certain criterion by which one can determine the position of any official by reading the DAILY WORKER. It is axiomatic that never, under any circumstances, is that newspaper known to praise or support sincere and effective anti-communists, especially editorially. In fact, communist publications have been known even to publish slight slaps on the wrists of actual Soviet agents in order to divert suspicion. Alger Hiss is one example. When praise and support is detected in communist papers of a high UN official as Ralph Bunche, it should appear conclusive that the communists consider him important enough to their cause to defend him.

OXFORD, ENGLAND, JULY 20-(REUTERS)-SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL HAD AN UNEXPECTED REUNION HERE DURING THE WEEKEND WITH AN OLD WARTIME COLLEAGUE NOW DRIVING A 19TH-CENTURY COACH AND FOUR.

CHURCHILL SHOWED VISIBLE SURPRISE WHEN SIR ARTHUR HARRIS, 67-YEAR-OLD COMMANDER IN CHIEF OF BRITAIN'S BOMBER COMMAND FROM 1942-45, DROVE UP IN THE COACH TO TAKE CHURCHILL FROM OXFORD TO BLENHEIM PALACE, A SUMPTUOUS HOME EIGHT MILES FROM HERE WHICH NOW IS OPEN TO THE PUBLIC.

HARRIS EXPLAINED THAT HE HAD TAKEN THE UNPAID JOB AS COACHMAN, DRIVING TOURISTS TO THE PALACCE, BECAUSE "I'VE ALWAYS BEEN KEEN ON HORSES."

Mr. Edward Murrow
Connaught Hotel
London, England

Dear Ed:

I'm sorry I haven't written to you since I returned from London at the end of November but I am sure you have had other means of keeping abreast of the situation concerning the Churchill programs. As you must know, Lloyd Burns of Screen Gems and I met with Mr. Seward of CBS as soon as we returned to New York. From that point on Screen Gems did the negotiating directly with Sig Mickelson and the next thing I knew there was a switch and ABC moved into the picture. I regret that I did not participate in the discussions with Sig or in the preliminary negotiations with ABC.

However, we now seem to be in a deal with ABC and I think this could be for the best. They are good guys at that network and are anxious to make a big splash with this program. I think we will be able to go all out to make the Churchill series the finest documentaries television has seen. Screen Gems will not enter into the production aspect in any way.

I would still love to work with you on this project but I have no idea as to ABC's feelings in the matter or even as to your availability under the new circumstances. The earliest we can get on the air now appears to be January, 1961.

I am coming to London to see Sir Winston when he returns from Monte Carlo and will give you a ring at that time. I will probably have Ollie Treyz and Tom Moore of ABC with me. Tentatively I am counting on leaving here about February 4th or 5th.

See you soon. Meantime, best regards.

Cordially,

"This — is London" meant throughout the war years one powerful fact for American radio listeners: they were about to hear one of EDWARD R. MURROW'S characteristically bold, accurate, steadfast accounts of Britain's struggle against the Nazis. A great reporter and a wise analyst now broadcasting on our own national affairs, Ed Murrow appraises for Atlantic readers The Hinge of Fate, the fourth and most controversial volume of Churchill's history of the Second World War, published by Houghton Mifflin.

CHURCHILL: THE HINGE OF FATE

I AM certainly not one of those who need to be prodded. In fact, if anything, I am a prod." (Winston Churchill in the House of Commons, February 11, 1942.)

"With all his faults, right or wrong, he was always for fighting; which is something." (From Winston Churchill, of Marlborough.)

The Hinge of Fate (Houghton Mifflin, $6.00) is the fourth volume dealing with World War II, produced by that ancient and honorable son of the House of Commons — Winston Spencer Churchill. It is, I think, the most revealing document to come from the pen of this great craftsman of the English language. At the not inconsiderable age of seventy-five he demonstrates again that he is a reporter without equal, a diplomat of great skill, a man of war with the habit of command heavy upon him. No other man of the century has made and written such history. And Churchill the Historian supports Churchill the Statesman.

This chronicle begins in 1942 with the onslaught of Japan; with the prolonged exchanges between Mr. Churchill and Prime Minister Curtin of Australia.

Mr. Churchill has been criticized for burdening this book with so many cables, telegrams, minutes, and directives. His explanation, not defense, is in essence that he has had enough of being criticized as a "partial editor and sub-editor of history" and he prefers to give his readers the raw meat of official data which they may digest, if they are able. The difficulty is, of course, that by no means all of the documents are here presented. The selection is Mr. Churchill's; and even giants are rumored to welcome additions to their strength. For example, Mr. Churchill gives us a glimpse of his exchange with General Auchinleck in the Desert in 1942. We find the Prime Minister advising the General as to enemy dispositions and what the General's action should be; telling Auchinleck to withhold certain information in his communiqués in order that Reporter Churchill might divulge this information to the House of Commons.

Mr. Churchill's chronicle moves to the fighting in the Malay Peninsula; the retreat to Singapore; more telegraphic argument between Mr. Curtin and Mr. Churchill; Mr. Churchill's dismay that there were no permanent fortifications covering the landward side of the naval base in the city of Singapore. Then we are back to domestic politics: a vote of confidence in the House of Commons in the face of Far Eastern disasters, Mr. Churchill's unsuccessful effort to persuade Sir Stafford Cripps to take the Ministry of Supply, the hostility between Lord Beaverbrook and Sir Stafford Cripps, Churchill trying to reshuffle his Cabinet to include Cripps; while the battle cruisers Scharnhorst and Gneisenau with the cruiser Prinz Eugen came out of Brest and ran the gantlet of the Channel, thereby creating more public dismay and resentment than was produced by the fall of Singapore. Mr. Churchill still isn't quite sure what happened at Singapore, and implies that an inquiry should be held.

In the early months of 1942 disaster continued in Asia, while shipping losses mounted in the Atlantic. There were more differences between Mr. Churchill and the Australian government, the Prime Minister failing to realize why Australians didn't react like Englishmen. Sir Stafford Cripps took off on his mission to India. Mr. Churchill makes it clear that his attitude toward the brightest jewel in the Crown had not changed in fifty years. He describes the desperate efforts to force convoys through to Murmansk, and he is unusually restrained in reporting the rough and surly answers he received from Stalin regarding both supplies and the second front.

But diplomacy, naval warfare, disposition of land forces, and domestic politics were not enough to occupy Mr. Churchill's time. He was prodding the scientists and the airmen about GEE, OBOE, and WINDOW. He accepted responsibility for everything, but would accept no diminution of his own authority. He even found time to set down his ideas of the post-war Europe which was not to be dominated by "barbarism."

Meanwhile he continued to prod Auchinleck to attack in the Desert. Rommel attacked first. Churchill counseled Auchinleck from a distance. The British were driven back, but it did not appear to occur to Mr. Churchill that if they could not hold on defense, they might not have had the force necessary to take the offensive against Rommel.

In March and April of '42 the correspondence between Churchill and Stalin became slightly more agreeable. Molotov arrived in London and stayed at the Prime Minister's country place at Chequers, where there occurred "some remarkable incidents." Mr. Molotov's room "had been thoroughly searched by his police officers. The bed was the object of particular attention. The mattresses were all prodded in case of infernal machines; and the sheets and blankets were re-arranged by the Russians so as to leave an opening in the middle of the bed, out of which the occupant could spring at a moment's notice, instead of being tucked in." One night the sentries in the garden saw a chink of light showing through Mr. Molotov's blackout curtains. The housekeeper at Chequers, "a Scottish lady in her prime, and of placid temperament," went up and knocked at Mr. Molotov's door. The door was opened about a foot, and Molotov confronted her with an automatic pistol in his right hand. Mr. Churchill believed that "the incident reveals one aspect of the gulf between the Soviet way of life and that of the Western Powers."

THROUGHOUT this volume Mr. Churchill exercises the utmost restraint in reporting his differences with Stalin, De Gaulle, and President Roosevelt. He devotes considerable space to critical debates in the House of Commons. And it is clear that a victory in the House pleased him only slightly less than a victory in the field. His affection and respect for Roosevelt and Harry Hopkins is never beneath the surface of his memory or his dispatches.

Regarding the deal with Admiral Darlan, Mr. Churchill deprecates purely military decisions, still retains his irritation with General de Gaulle, and fails to make clear that Admiral Darlan ordered the cease-fire in North Africa after the firing had ceased of its own accord. Darlan's assassination "relieved the Allies of their embarrassment at working with him." Churchill the Parliamentarian is obviously not proud of the "Darlan Deal." But Churchill the Man of War was and is persuaded that it contributed to victory, and he hopes the tortured Admiral may rest in peace.

Churchill is candid when he discusses the invitation to General de Gaulle to join the two giants at the Casablanca meeting. He says that Elliott Roosevelt hastened to write about the confidential talks he heard at the meals to which he was brought by his father. "He seems to suggest that the President suspected me of trying to stop De Gaulle coming, and objecting to his being brought there." Churchill produces the cablegrams to refute this and says of young Mr. Roosevelt's book: "This rubbish has had a wide and long currency."

The phrase "unconditional surrender" gave Mr. Churchill a feeling of surprise when he heard the President use it at a press conference at Casablanca. He thinks perhaps it had been mentioned in prior conversations, but he isn't sure. As usual, he takes his share of responsibility. And anyway, whatever the origin, he doesn't think it was a mistake. It is not Mr. Churchill's habit to regard decisions once taken as having been in error. He still believes that his desire to go into northern Norway instead of North Africa was correct, and it would be difficult to prove that he was wrong. He was impelled in part by a desire to bring more effective and immediate help to the Soviet Union, although he was under no illusion as to Russia's past or probable future policy. And he was, during the period of this narrative, subjected to harassing and "needling" correspondence from Stalin.

The Hinge of Fate reveals Mr. Churchill as one of those rare Englishmen who can get along with foreigners; who insisted that only his view should prevail, after reasonable but not too long discussion. He clearly found his relations with American officers agreeable, although in recounting his experiences with Generals Eisenhower and Mark Clark he appears to neglect to report what might be called a typical Churchillian intervention.

On one occasion, during lunch at 10 Downing Street, General Clark so far forgot himself as to preface a remark to Mr. Churchill by saying: "Of course you civilians . . ." The General's remaining words of wisdom were unspoken, because the Prime Minister growled at him: "Young man, I was killing people when you were puling and puking in your blanket."

Throughout the war Mr. Churchill never really regarded himself as a civilian. He was quite prepared — as he did — to order his pilot to gain altitude in order to avoid a mountaintop which was nowhere near the course of flight. The habit of command was strong in this incredible individual with the restless, ranging mind, who throughout his life has found that green and pleasant Island too small a stage upon which to play.

He regarded himself, I suspect, as a great commander, unavoidably and unfortunately prevented from commanding armies in the field because his services were more urgently needed for the central and supreme direction of the war. He could scarcely endure to see a conflict looming over the horizon without being seized with an almost irresistible urge to grasp the English language in both hands and use it as a cudgel. His favorite adjectives appear to be "austere," "sombre," "sordid," and "squalid." He seldom employs a phrase that has lost its cutting edge.

He acknowledges only one master, which is the House of Commons, unless it be his wife, whose judgment of individuals and issues often surpasses his own, and who can and does interrupt what the late Harold Laski once called "those thunderous and well-rehearsed improvisations" with the remark: "Shut up, Winston, and listen to this."

Mr. Churchill was, in his own words, "brought up and trained to have the utmost contempt for people who get drunk." But at the same time he cannot resist the attraction of an intoxicating phrase that rolls well off the tongue. He labors long over his public utterances and has the rare ability to taste a sentence before he writes or utters it. He was able, during the war years, to mobilize Elizabethan language in a manner that lifted the hearts of his fellow countrymen. He divined and tapped the wellsprings of their tradition, their fears, their hopes, and their arrogance.

He was and is an astounding combination of a gallant gambler, an aristocrat, an historian, and an early eighteenth century cavalry officer. At the same time his sense of humor labels him as one of the world's indestructible juveniles.

He is, I think, the most considerable man to walk the stage of world history in the last fifty years. His own version of history will support his actions. He both made it and wrote it. Later historians who have access to full documentation may amend or reverse his conclusions. But he is, as they will be, the prisoner of experience.

In these four volumes, with which historians may disagree but which they cannot ignore, Winston Churchill has permitted himself two mild expressions of personal regret or bitterness. One, over the fact that the House of Commons refused him permission to install recording apparatus for one of his great speeches; and two, over the fact that the British electorate "turned him out to pasture" when victory had been achieved.

The four volumes contain a substantial clue as to why his fellow countrymen denied him political power when the fighting was done. He was, in a sense, scarcely aware of them. For him the battle was everything. He drove himself so hard in the intoxicating atmosphere of high command that he failed to realize that other millions of nameless Britons, without his heritage, ability, or vision, were driving themselves as relentlessly; that they had visions of a fuller measure of equality — milk and hot lunches for their children, decent houses, and "fair shares for all."

I think it is true that most nations in time of war and dire peril dig back into their history, their folklore, and their traditions for support and sustenance. The British did that, and fortunately found them all wrapped up in one man. In the dark days they committed their present to his keeping. But they refused him the burden of the privilege of guiding their future.

This volume is Mr. Churchill's version of the turning tide or the hinge of fate. Historians may disagree with him about Dieppe or Darlan. They may feel that he selected his documents to sustain his judgment. They may conclude, as I did at the time, that his popularity was greater in this country than it was in Britain — just as Roosevelt's was greater in Britain than it was here. They may conclude that his knowledge of the past was so great as to becloud his perspective of the future.

I do not pretend to know upon what myth or fact future historians will agree. But I would hope that out of these four volumes, those to come, and all the footnotes and documents of the era, those historians will succeed in dredging up the essential greatness of Mr. Churchill.

That greatness is not, I suggest, his courage, his eloquence, patriotism, tenacity, or knowledge of history. His critics who condemn him for arrogance, for not having changed his mind for fifty years, for his imperialistic — or if you like, reactionary — utterances will, I hope, be confounded by a single fact. He truly regarded himself as a servant of the House of Commons. No democracy in modern time has been nearer than was Britain to the all-consuming flame of totalitarianism — and survived. It was Mr. Churchill's purpose and policy that the nation he led should survive or perish in freedom, and in a manner calculated to bring applause and respect from ancestors and descendants. This adherence and scrupulous attention to parliamentary procedure may prove an example, a hinge of fate more powerful than anything recorded in these four volumes.

I find no indication that there was ever a time when Mr. Churchill could have lost the war in an afternoon. But there were certainly times when he could have destroyed, or at least irreparably damaged, the faith of the Western world that it can defend its freedom without losing it in the process.

The conduct, the character, and the behavior of Mr. Churchill and his fellow countrymen were more eloquent than any book even he is likely to write. It was proof of what he said in a moment of serious levity at Ottawa, in December of 1941: "We have not journeyed across the centuries, across the oceans, across the mountains, across the prairies, because we are made of sugar candy."

A conference of distinguished poets was held in Cambridge last summer in connection with the Harvard Summer School, and their discussion brought out these illuminating words of PIERRE EMMANUEL, the French poet and critic. Mr. Emmanuel, who was born in 1916, is the author of some fifteen volumes of prose and verse; he taught mathematics and philosophy at a French lycée but stepped out of academic dress to take an active part in the Resistance movement. He is now in charge of the English-language broadcasts of the French government radio station, Radio Diffusion Française.

THE POWER OF THE POET

I WISH to examine here a general problem, that of the communicability of poetry — or, more precisely, the conditions poetry must fulfill in order to become a common mode of expression and to cease being an idiom for initiates, a sacred but dead language. We are living in a world where the interest of such a discussion may appear quite insignificant to certain minds. Without a doubt, we believe in poetry in general, but the poet, in his heart, doubts the seriousness of what he conceitedly calls his poetic activity, as soon as he becomes attacked by the monstrous sorrow of the world, by the images of war, bombardments, concentration camps, and slums.

In these days, to allow oneself the luxury of sitting before a sheet of paper to lament the flight of time, or, as Unamuno says, to sing of the thighs of a passing mistress, would seem a childishness so scandalous that, lacking irony, simple modesty would be sufficient to deter us.

We are plunged into a century which leaves us no way out, involved as we are in the confusion, the misery, and the crimes of our time. That communion which men cannot attain in the harmony of a mutual ideal, they are attaining today in the universal anguish which drags them into mutual ruin.

We feel that this solidarity in destruction and death is our most precious asset, the hallmark of our human condition, our only place in the sun. If there is in man a ferment of love which inspires him with the thirst for language, the need of surpassing himself by expression, to create universal values, it can be found only where the weight of history is the most compelling and the abandonment the most despairing: that is, in the common human fabric that suffers, that cries in vain toward happiness, and dies in order to find it — or too often because of not finding it.

In the face of this suffering which invades us, how disarmed we are — we, the manipulators of phrases. We should like both to say and to act — and we are ever but sayers, "les diseurs de mots."

Words have lost their power; if they have still an effect of magic, they are incapable of carrying us forward, of bearing witness to our faith in them. Language no longer has the value of a moral action which would create the example and the type, the ratio between what should be and what is.

Of course, we speak learnedly of the stars, we meddle with unexpected metamorphoses, and the richness of imaginary marvels encumbers our verses. We are proud of having delved very deeply into what we call poetic experience, to have enlarged the field of imagery and liberated words from their ordinary sense.

But is not this precisely our mistake? We no longer speak like ordinary men, and our isolation humiliates us, in spite of the proud solitude with which we mask our humiliation. For we feel keenly that what man lacks most in the present disorder of thought is the common meaning, the verity that is true for all, a verity whose formulation escapes us. We have lost the power to utter it with a conviction which the words exact.

We believe ourselves responsible for language, and it belongs to the dignity of the artist to carry that responsibility to the end. But what does this responsibility require from us if not to preserve, to search out, and to magnify more and more the common meaning of everybody's words, the concrete experience by which the humblest lives grow?

Do you remember the line by Hölderlin in his elegy "Brot und Wein": "Brot is der Erde Frucht, doch ist vom Lichte gesegnet — Bread is the fruit of the earth, but by light is it blessed"? The things of common experience, sentiments, aspirations, receive their true meaning from this double reality, earthly and luminous. The vocation of the poet is to give to all things their part of light, their portion of beauty which transfigures them.

CONFIDENTIAL

My dear Sir Winston:

I was distressed to learn that you were inconvenienced on your return from the south of France. It seems to me that you should not be subjected to the vicissitudes of travel that afflict ordinary mortals.

Should you be inclined to re-consider the television project outlined in my letter of July 25, 1955, copy of which is enclosed, I should be delighted to fly over to London any week-end to discuss it with you.

I have just returned from a fortnight in Israel where you are much revered and where there appears to be no residue of resentment against the British.

I beg you to convey my warmest respects to Lady Churchill.

Sincerely yours,

The Rt. Hon. Sir Winston Churchill, K.G., O.M., C.H., F.R.S.

My dear Sir Winston:

I venture to address you again regarding our conversation dealing with television.

We at the Columbia Broadcasting System have given considerable thought to a television program or programs which would perform a public service to the English-speaking peoples and which might merit your consideration and participation. We have considered and discarded many possibilities and have finally become persuaded that we should like to prepare a visual document for posterity. This to consist of a total of five hours of filmed conversation with you. This film could be made at your convenience, either in Britain or on the Continent. It would be done outdoors, in natural light so that you would not be subjected to the inconvenience of artificial lighting.

The questions put to you would cover the great sweep of your experience and participation in world affairs and would not be calculated to make news or stimulate current controversy. The film could be made not all at once, but perhaps in sequences of one hour each, spread over as many days as might be convenient to you.

You would, of course, retain the right to cause us to eliminate, and indeed destroy, any of the film which did not meet with your approval after it had been processed and developed.

The entire proceedings would require five hours of your time, those hours to be scheduled at your convenience, and I suggest that the result would be an historical document altogether unique which will be available to future generations. Consider the instruction and inspiration that might be drawn from similar visual documents of Lincoln, Pitt and Hadrian if such documents existed.

We are primarily interested in having the film available for our own television use. At the same time, we can foresee the desirability of a wider dissemination of this historical document and its component parts. For that reason, we would wish to have unlimited rights to use, and to permit others to use, the film and materials contained therein in all media.

If this proposal has merit in your view, the Columbia Broadcasting System is prepared to pay over to you the sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000.00) in return for your participation in the film and for all rights in the film and of copyright. It would be my privilege to ask the questions and edit the film, a task that would be undertaken with deep admiration and affection as well as with such technical skills as I may possess.

These five hours of your time might be stolen for posterity any time between mid-August and mid-September. Should you care to discuss this matter in person, I, of course, stand ready to fly to London at your command.

Sincerely yours,

The Rt. Hon. Sir Winston Churchill, K.G., O.M., C.H., F.R.S.

I will have more information about the Sir Winston setup after Korda's representative reports back to me, but what concerns me about your proposed visit to London is his message to you some time ago that he had already commited himself to Sir Alexander Korda for any television work which he would do.

I should think your trip might have more fruitful results if you wrote to him, expressing the hope that it still might be possible for you to work out a filmed interview along the lines of your letter to him on that subject and suggesting that, if there is any chance that it might be worked out, you would be happy to fly to London in November. It might catch him just at a moment when your proposal might strike him as being easier to fulfill than the others he is receiving, or the success of the record album might make him feel that he would be in better hands by dealing and working with you.

Churchill's letter implies that he has made an over-all deal with Korda; this, of course, may be a polite way for Churchill to turn us down. My own feeling is that if we desire to pursue the matter, it would be best for Mr. Paley to try and unscramble the situation in a telephone call to Korda.

For that reason, we would wish to have unlimited rights to use, and to permit others to use, the film and materials contained therein in all media.

If this proposal has merit in your view, the Columbia Broadcasting System is prepared to pay over to you the sum of One hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) in return for your participation in the film and for all rights in the film and in materials embodied in it, including, of course, all rights of copyright. It would be my privilege to ask the questions and edit the film, a task that would be undertaken with deep admiration and affection as well as with such technical skills as I may possess.

These five hours of your time might be stolen for posterity any time between mid-August and mid-September. Should you care to discuss this matter in person, I, of course, stand ready to fly to London at your command.

Sincerely yours,

ACR

Dear Mr Murrow

Sir Winston Churchill has asked me to express to you his very warm thanks for the trouble you have taken. It was most useful to us to have the views of someone of your standing on this matter.

Sir Winston asks me to send you his very good wishes, and to say that he hopes to see you over here before long.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Murrow:

I invite you to join in paying tribute to Sir Winston Churchill on the occasion of the presentation to him of the Admiral Richard E. Byrd Memorial Award given annually "for leadership in the cause of the free world." Our Award will be presented at the 25th Anniversary Dinner of the International Rescue Committee, of which I am President, on the evening of Tuesday, November 25th at the Hotel Astor in New York City.

This Award was established in 1957 in memory of the late Admiral Richard E. Byrd, who contributed immeasurably during the latter part of his life to the aid of refugees from Communist tyranny.

Sir Winston's message to us on that evening will be delivered by Commander, The Rt. Honourable Allan Noble, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom and Chief of the British Delegation to the United Nations.

In honoring Sir Winston for his unparalleled service to the free world, we are also helping to focus attention on those refugees from totalitarianism who have escaped to freedom. Indicative of the human values salvaged by the work of the International Rescue Committee, to which Admiral Byrd devoted the last decade of his life, we will have with us on that evening the world-famous sculptor, Jacques Lipchitz, the heroic Lord Mayor of Budapest, Joseph Koevago, and Merek Hlasko, Polish author of the Eighth Day of the Week, all of whom have escaped from oppression. Their presence will symbolize the spirit which animates all men who desire to be free and whom our organization is pledged to aid.

I know that you share my veneration for Sir Winston Churchill, and I hope very much you will consent to lend your name as a sponsor of our dinner in his honor.

I hope also to welcome you to our gathering on that occasion and I am enclosing a reservation card for your convenience. Please let me know how many places you and your associates desire.

With every good wish.

Sincerely yours,

My dear Sir Winston:

I write further regarding the possible disposition of the movie rights to "History of the English-Speaking Peoples". My friends in Hollywood are of course lavish in their praise of the literary merit of the work but seem to feel that they lack either the skill or the financial resources to turn it into a movie. I think they are wrong, but then I am not a producer.

Dear Sam:

It rather looks now as though I will be going to the Middle East instead of to the West Coast, but I am not yet sure.

I think I mentioned to you that when I talked to Sir Winston Churchill in London last May he asked me, in his usual gracious fashion, to enquire whether there might be any interest in this country in the television or movie rights to his "History of the English-Speaking Peoples". I have pretty well determined that there is no interest in television and I am wondering what you would think of the possibility of developing any interest in the movie world.

My love to you and Frances.

Dear Mr Murrow

I discussed with Sir Winston the matter of the sale of the television rights of A HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING PEOPLES which came up at luncheon. He quite agrees that it would be very helpful if you could take discreet soundings and let him know if there is any market for it. As you know, it was on offer some 18 months ago, but nothing came of it.

Sir Winston himself could not, of course, appear or assist in any way - it would be merely a straight sale of the television and/or film rights.

I so much enjoyed meeting you here, and I hope that I shall have an opportunity to do so again.

Yours sincerely

Anthony Montague Browne

Mr. Ed Murrow.

July 25, 1955

My dear Sir Winston:

I venture to address you again regarding our conversation dealing with television.

We at the Columbia Broadcasting System have given considerable thought to a television program or programs which would perform a public service to the English-speaking peoples and which might merit your consideration and participation. We have considered and discarded many possibilities and have finally become persuaded that we should like to prepare a visual document for posterity. This to consist of a total of five hours of filmed conversation with you. This film could be made at your convenience, either in Britain or on the Continent. It would be done outdoors, in natural light so that you would not be subjected to the inconvenience of artificial lighting.

The questions put to you would cover the great sweep of your experience and participation in world affairs and would not be calculated to make news or stimulate current controversy. The film could be made not all at once, but perhaps in sequences of one hour each, spread over as many days as might be convenient to you.

You would, of course, retain the right to cause us to eliminate, and indeed destroy, any of the film which did not meet with your approval after it had been processed and developed.

The entire proceedings would require five hours of your time, those hours to be scheduled at your convenience, and I suggest that the result would be an historical document altogether unique which will be available to future generations. Consider the instruction and inspiration that might be drawn from similar visual documents of Lincoln, Pitt and Hadrian if such documents existed.

We are primarily interested in having the film available for our own television use. At the same time, we can foresee the desirability of a wider dissemination of this historical document and its component parts. For that reason, we would wish to have unlimited rights to use, and to permit others to use, the film and materials contained therein in all media.

If this proposal has merit in your view, the Columbia Broadcasting System is prepared to pay over to you the sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000.00) in return for your participation in the film and for all rights in the film and in materials embodied in it, including, of course, all rights of copyright. It would be my privilege to ask the questions and edit the film, a task that would be undertaken with deep admiration and affection as well as with such technical skills as I may possess.

These five hours of your time might be stolen for posterity any time between mid-August and mid-September. Should you care to discuss this matter in person, I, of course, stand ready to fly to London at your command.

The Insurance Company of North America has inquired whether Winston Churchill would be available to make a 7 or 8 minute talk on a subject of his own choosing to be used during a special one-hour Radio program of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

This is the company which sponsored the Christmas SING WITH BING. It is interested in sponsoring three or four hour-long shows per year.

Mr. Mickelson suggested that I consult you on this matter in view of your previous discussions with Mr. Churchill.

The CBS Radio Network also has had an inquiry whether Mr. Churchill would be available to do a regular weekly commentary.

Your advice on the above matters would be appreciated.

CHURCHILL--Life and Times.

Prospectus: 26 half-hour television programs based on the life and times of Winston Churchill.

Materials: Near-complete Churchill broadcasts covering his epoch. There is also adequate film material from 1914 on.

The period 1874-1914 can be developed through stills and Churchill voice, plus sufficient ancient footage covering that era.

GENERAL APPROACH: There have been numerous television and film programs dealing with the newsreel history of our times. This series could be much more gratifying from all points of view--scholarship, general interest, living history, prestige--if first-rate historical interpretation is adhered to rigorously. Secondly, great dramatic impact could be achieved by using Churchill broadcasts to narrate many of the historical periods covered. Thus, the rise of Hitler could combine the brilliant film now ~~kkmt~~ held by Alien Property with that prophetic broadcast of Churchill's in 1934. Russia's entrance into WW2 could be almost completely narrated by Churchill's 22 Jun 41 broadcast. Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor never had more dramatic commentary that Churchill's 8 Dec 41 or 26 Dec 41 speeches. Churchill's childhood, youth and early manhood could be narrated by portions of his various later-year speeches over the numerous photos of those early days. And so on.

Note: See Folder CBS - Consultative News - Public Affairs for covering memos.

#1. Victorian Glories.

"For us in Britain, the nineteenth century ended amid the glories of the Victorian era, and we entered upon the dawn of the twentieth in high hope for our country, our Empire and the world...Little did we guess that what has been called the Century of the Common Man would witness as its outstanding feature more common men killing each other with greater facilities than any other five centuries put together in the history of the world. But we entered this terrible twentieth century with confidence."

There is an endless supply--probably all copyright--of still photos of Churchill the baby...his American mother...his politically prominent father...his days at Sandhurst...the army...Cuba...India...the Nile... the Boer War...his return to England...in politics...still photos or even film footage of the Royal Family, symbolic of British imperial sway... the massing of German power...American internal expansion--rails, auto-- fashions of the time...beginnings of the film...Russo-Japanese 1904 war... Teddy Roosevelt mediation at Portsmouth.

This first program could combine much of Churchill's humourous reminiscent commentary of his early days, and would serve as a brief survey of "the nineteenth century ending amid the glories of the Victorian era."

#2. Trial of Strength.

"In the first decade of the twentieth century with new patterns of warships, naval rivalries became acute and fierce. Civilized governments began to think in terms of dreadnnughts. It was in such a setting very difficult to prevent the first world war...The impulses toward a trial of strength in Europe were far stronger at this time. Germany, demanding her 'place in the sun,' was faced by a resolute France with her military honour to regain. England, in accordance with her foreign policy of 300 years, sustained the weaker side. France found an ally in the Russia of the Czars and Germany in the crumbling Empire of the Habsburgs. The United States...stood aloof and expected to be able to watch as a spectator, the thrilling fearful drama unfold across what was then called 'the Broad Atlantic."---

Film footage on first world war...

Especially trench warfare which Churchill hated...

British, German, US, Russian fronts...

Churchill as First Lord...disaster at Gallipoli...

Lloyd George...Wilson at home...Liberty Bond drives...

Attacks on 'pro-German' civil liberties within US...

Still photos of Churchill at front...

Chateau Thierry, Belleau Woods...

Revolution in Russia...

Victory in Europe...

Assemblage at Versailles...

CHURCHILL--Life and Times.

#3. The Bolshevik Revolution.

"The failure to strangle Bolshevism at its birth and to bring Russia, then prostrate, by one means or another, into the general democratic system lies heavily upon us today."

See It Now footage on Bolshevik Revolution is one of best done, although there's a tremendous amount of material kicking around--Artkino, Soviet films--that could add up to a powerhouse of a half hour...Churchill was a leading exponent of intervention, but war-weariness and British Laborite sympathies, plus Bolshevik defense, defeated the intervention...This half hour could start with 1905 and go down to 1930, with Stalin triumphant... William Randolph Hearst's full page editorials 1918-1933 calling for recognition of Bolshevik Russia--"truest democracy in world today"--might lend a nostalgic touch...

#4. The Peace-Makers.

"After four years of hideous mechanical slaughter...the victorious allies assembled at Versailles. High hopes and spacious opportunities awaited them. To stop another war was the supreme object and duty of the statesmen who met as friends and allies around the Peace Table. They made great errors... Nevertheless, the statesmen of Versailles, largely at the inspiration of President Wilson, an inspiration implemented effectively by British thought, created the League of Nations. This is their defense before history, and had the League been resolutely sustained and used, it would have saved us all."

Film footage undoubtedly available on Versailles...

Europe greets Wilson...

Wilson, George, Clemenceau, Orlando

US troops demobilizing...

Cabot Lodge, Johnson...fight against League...Wilson travels thru US

Civil war in Russia...Germany...Hungary...rioting in Italy...

Death of Lenin and Wilson...

Harding in Power...

British Labor Govt

Churchill back to Conservatives...

Germany, Weimar Republic...

Russia...dislocation...Quaker Missions...Stalin-Trotzky

Italy...Mussolini to power...

Hungary...Revolution and counter-revolution...

China...Sun Yat Sen, Chiang Kai Shek-Communist alliance, rupture, civil war

India...Warnings of colonial breakdown...

Bootlegging...

William Jennings Bryan-Darrow Scopes Trial...

Autumn, 1929--the Great World Depression

There is not much social history on this period in available Churchill recordings, and yet this may be one of the most fascinating film periods of all in its nostalgia and historical impact...Film footage should abound...

CHURCHILL--Life and Times.

#6. The Rise of Hitler.

"You see these dictators on their pedestals, surrounded by the bayonets of their soldiers and the trucheons of their police..."

Churchill's 1934 and 1938 broadcasts have about fifteen minutes of magnificent stuff on the rise of Hitler (and Mussolini by indirection) and this could be laid over the best film footage available on Hitler's rise, such as was used by You Are There (which evidently came from Alien Property out of the original German terror films)...

background footage possibly available--certainly in stills--on Hitler-Von Ludendorff Munich putsch...

Anti-semitic outrages in streets...film available from US army...

Remilitarization of Rhineland footage...

Austrian Anschluss...Dolfuss...Stahremberg, etc...

Litvinoff on collective security...

Hitler points towards Czechoslovakia...

#7. Death of a Dream.

"It is said that the League of Nations failed. If so, that is largely because it was abandonned, and later on betrayed; because those who were its best friends were till a very late period infected with a futile pacifism; because the United States, the originating impulse, fell out of the line; because while France had been bled white and England was supine and bewildered, a monstrous growth of aggression sprang up in Germany, in Italy and Japan."

Chinese Incident (with Churchill commentary) Japan at Mukden...Manchuria...
Mussolini's invasion of Ethippia...war footage...Haile Selassie

#8. Munich.

"We have sustained a national disaster." "We must arm...Britain must arm. America must arm."

Adequate footage exists on this whole period...much of it in the United States, probably better stuff in Europe...

Chamberlain...

Hitler and Musso at Brenner Pass...

Benes...Masaryk...

Czechoslovakia falls...Entire military position of Europe is changed...

Stalin's warning he will pull no one's chestnuts out of fire...

Curious Strang Mission to Moscow...

Roosevelt stuff...

Joe Louis...Schmeling...

Churchill out of power...perhaps some travel footage on him exists in England..

Hitler points at Poland...

Unfortunately, the brilliant Churchill speeches warning on the disaster of Munich do not exist in BBC library...It is possible that some of Churchill's friends may have this material.

#9. The Battle for Poland.

"We tried again and again to prevent this war, and for the sake of peace we put up with a lot of things happening which ought not to have happened. But now we are at war, and we are going to make war, and perservere in making war, until the other side have had enough of it."--

Hitler-Stalin Pact of August 1939--Churchill's commentary...film footage on pact probably exists with Germans and Russians, possibly in US too...

Hitler invades Poland...undoubtedly great footage exists...

Russian moves from east...probably plenty of footage...

EHurchill recordings describing plight of Poland...

Defeat of Poland...

Phony war...sitzkrieg...wash on the maginot line...Churchill commentary...

Roosevelt vs. isolationism in United States...

Churchill in command of Admiralty...

Russo-Finnish war...plenty of footage probably with Russians, but let's not use that shot of three Finns surrounding an ~~xxxxx~~ entire Soviet division...

Brilliant Churchill commentary on Russo-Finnish war...

Chamberlain agreement to permit British volunteers to fight in Finland...

End of Finnish war...talks of peace deals between Hitler and England...Churchill's violent negative on deals...

War in Scandinavia...

Churchill brought to power....

#10. Battle for France.

"I speak to you for the first time as Prime Minister in a solemn hour for the life of our country, of our empire, of our allies, and above all for the cause of freedom. A tremendous battle is raging in France and Flanders."

Churchill takes over...

Hitler stabs in Holland and Belgium

British move into Belgium

Hitler breaks into France...

Churchill's 19 May '40 broadcast can narrate entire footage on German victory in West...

Dunkirk...

Roosevelt, Charlottesville, 10 Jun 40--"hand that held the dagger"--Italy in war...

France defeated...Compiegne...

Churchill 18 Jun '40--Battle of France is over..."This was their finest hour."

#11. Battle for Britain.

"Never in the history of human conflict did so many owe so much to so few."

There must be some splendid, rarely seen German footage of their naval buildup for invasion of England...

Churchill's broadcasts describing this buildup could narrate almost this entire program...

British defensive buildup...

air raid shelters...

Home guards...

Churchill visiting battle stations...

Roosevelt arsenal for democracy...

Russia takes over Baltic provinces...

DeGaulle appeals to French..British sink French fleet off Dakar...

Air War over Britain...

Britain Can take it...

#12. His Finest Hour.

"It was my good fortune to give the Lion's Roar!"

This should be a half hour dedicated to Churchill, the organizer of the British spirit. There must be considerable footage of Churchill in England in 1940-41, in every imagineable situation, dressed in every possible dress, going about the country, talking at meetings, boarding ships, examining rifles, sitting on rooftops, going into air raid shelters...And this should be accompanied by some of his most stirring speeches calling on his countrymen to stand fast.

The film itself should become an historic item of Churchilliana.

#13. Battle for the Balkans.

"...the crafty, cold-blooded, black-hearted Italian, who had thought to gain an empire on the cheap by stabbing fallen France in the back--he got into trouble."

Churchill's greatest Barrymore-like orations were left for Benito Mussolini. His recordings could narrate half this program as we see Mussolini in war dress, speechifying, his troops cutting into Greece, his meetings with Hitler to get Hitler to bail him out...British response in Greece...British defeat...

Roosevelt's third term...

Wilkie's visit to Churchill--"Sail On O ship of state..."

America's first peace-time draft...Stimson picks first draftee...

Molotov-Hitler discussions--possibly German film available...

Hitler's secret decision to invade Russia...

Yugoslvia beaten down...Mihailovitch-Tito footage if any available...

Defeat in the Balkans...

#14. Battle of the Atlantic.

"That is what is called the Battle of the Atlantic."

Anyone of the 26 Victory-at-Sea gives you an idea of the type of footage involved in this program. But let's not use the same ship--it got boring after twenty six half hours.

Dear Lynton:

I do indeed remember you from BBC days during the war.

Many thanks for taking the time to write about the Churchill Birthday recording. I can assure you that every word of it was vintage Churchill. There were no imitations of any kind.

Both Sir Winston and Lady Churchill had been kind enough to write me very generous and gracious letters about the recording.

I hope there will be an opportunity for us to get together the next time I am in London.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

Dear Ed,!

I don't know if you will remember me from B.B.C. days during the war when I was in charge of Recording? I left in 1946 and have had my own Recording Studio off Piccadilly ever since. We have done some work for your people here, and I am writing now to tell you how much impressed I was with your Birthday Programme, which I heard with Howard Smith and our Manager at No. 10 on Wednesday. Of course Howard Smith will have written you his impressions and I heard the P.M. say that he was going to write, but remembering you from days gone by, I thought I must write and tell you my own impressions.

I was particularly interested because N.B.C. invited me to do a four minute talk which they included in their programme. It was only an outline of how the P.M. goes to work on his scripts and so on, based on visits I have paid to Chartwell and our experiences when he came to my Studio here. We of course did the copying of the B.B.C. records (they didn't ~~entrusting them to anyone else and of course I know them very well as I helped collect them).~~

Although I have been to see him several times before I don't remember an occasion quite like the other night. He was dressed in a maroon corduroy boiler-suit over his pyjamas, and Lady Churchill was with him. She told me you had been to visit them, and said some very nice things. We played the tapes back in the Regency Drawing Room upstairs, and they were both as usual most hospitable. ~~He insisted on giving me another book although he had already inscribed several for my family and myself.~~

But what was important was his reaction to your programme which, if I may say so, I thought admirable. I was particularly interested in the fact that when it was over he remarked on how good "the imitations" were. I thought he must be referring to the early speeches as President of the Board of Trade or Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1908 and 1909, and have forgotten that these were recorded on cylinders at the time.

So I tried to assure him that there were no "imitations". However, he knew better and said there must be because "some of the things were from his book".

If this is correct all I can say is that they were the best imitations I have ever heard, and I should be very interested to know who did them. I agreed with Lady Churchill that you couldn't have done them unless you had been concealing your skill as an imitator all these years.

He seemed very well but I thought very old, and he was not exactly optimistic about the new developments.

He was delighted with your programme and said he thought the continuity was wonderful. He is still very bitter about the eleven years during which he wasn't allowed to broadcast over here, but he remembers his friends.

With kind regards,

Yours Sincerely

(H. Lynton Fletcher)

P.S. By the way, if there is anything that we can do for you at any time don't hesitate to let us know. We are moving to new premises at Marble Arch, on the site of the old Post Office Sorting Bay there, in March where we shall have three Studios. It looks as if one of them would be much occupied by the B.B.C. for the next few months, but we shall always be able to help you.

I don't know if you remember the original Radio Gazette I did which preceded Radio News Reel? Have you ever thought of a News Letter on these lines? We get around a lot and hear a lot of news which I should have thought would have made an interesting weekly bulletin.

WINSTON CHURCHILL
80TH BIRTHDAY

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1954
7:45--8:00 P. ., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The President agrees with Secreatry of State Dulles that an air or naval blockade of Communist China would amount to "war actions"..Mr. Dulles said last night that we want to use peaceful means to sustain our international rights...and those of our citizens...rather than resorting to "war actions." White House Secretary Hagerty today told reporters the President agrees. And Senate Majority Leader Knowland who suggested the blockade, says he'll support any effective alternate plan that will secure the release of the 13 Americans now in Red Chian's jails. Knowland also said his split with the Administration's foreign policy is not as great as some would lake it appear to be. Mr. Dulles promised vigorous action to get the release of the 13 Americans. Knowland says he'll wait to find out what this will be.

We now have told Red China that we are indignant over "their deliberate flouting of international agreements and civilized practices."...in the way they handled the 13 Americans. This message was communicated by an American official in Geneva. The Chinese refused to accept the protest. And the Communist radio today broadcast details purporting to prove that two of the imprisoned Americans were spies.

In Washington tonight, reporters were told that the Administration will ask Congress for authority to join in a new economic program to help the free nations of South Asia and the Far East. West European nations will be asked to join. There's no suggestion yet on how big the project will be.

The Senate today heard opposing views on whether to censure McCarthy. Democratic Senator Fulbright of Arkansas said his colleagues must demonstrate their honor and self-respect by rebuking McCarthy for having "shaken confidence in schools, the churches and government." But Republican Senator Mundt said if McCarthy is censured the Communists will misrepresent it as a retreat in the fight against Communism. Fulbright said McCarthy aas "so preyed upon the fears and hatreds of the uninformed and credulous people that he has started a prarie fire" which neither he nor anyone else may be able to control. He said since this debate started the character of his mail has changed. Fulbright said: "It is no longer criticism, it is unadulterated hate, vituperation and abuse. It is highly emotional, irrational and designed to intimidate and over-awe" the Senate. And Senator Mundt said that to censure McCarthy for his alleged abuse of General Zwicker would "shrivel and shrink" the prestige of Congress as against what he called the "arrogance" of executive agencies. Mundt said that through the New Deal years Congress lost power to the executive branch of government..because Congress didn't dare stand up. He says he will have no part of what he called "this new surrender." And Mundt warned Southern Senators to beware. He said there was " a hidden bomb" in the censure resolution that "someday is going to explode all over Dixie". Mundt called for what he described as a "third course" in the censure debate. He would set up new rules for investigation committees and have a study made on a code of conduct for Senators...on and off the Senate floor. Republican Senator Martin of Pennsylvania says he'll vote against censure...has long admired McCarthy's Americanism. And new Senator Brown of Nevada said censure would establish dangerous precedents limiting Congressional investigations.

Defense Secretary Wilson says the next Congress will be asked to extend the draft law for four years beyond its expiration date..now set for the end of June. Wilson says Congress will also be asked to set-up a madified universal military training program ..to train 100-thousand men a year for six-months periods and then assign them to reserve outifts. Wilson will also sk for pay increases for military men...ranging from three to six percent of present schedules.

Field Marshal Montgomery said in Los Angeles today that the United States must be ready to "take it"..and to strike back...if we are to survive in the years of "co-existence with conflict" we face in the future. He said history will measure American success "not so much by the quantity of your dollars as by the quality of your leadership."

South Africas governing Nationalist party today chose Johannes Strytom to be the new prime minister. He favors a stern policy of racial segregation...would abandon use of the English language..and make his country a republic. It's not clear whether he wants South Africa to remain in the British Commonwealth of Nations.

The British are an emotional, sentimental people, with a great fondness for antiquity. The sentiment and the emotion are seldom displayed, but it happened in London today. The occasion was the 80th birthday of Sir Winston Churchill - a flood of gifts, a joint session of Parliament, nonpartisan oratory, a portrait, a fund that may go to three million dollars - all in honor of perhaps the most considerable man to talk the stage of history in our time. His own island, wrapped in the Atlantic mists, was never a large enough stage for him to play upon. He has served six soverigns; his experience of war extends from the last full-dress calalry charge to the Hydrogen Bomb. For 52 years he has sat in the House of Commons. He hasnot always bee right; but never has he been ambiguous.

Today was the most memorable public occasion of his life. Today, in recalling the war years, he said: "The people's will was resolute and remoreseless. I only expressed it. They had the lion's heart, I had the luck to be called upon to give it the roar."

This ancient aristocrat, born in the tranquil, serene Victorian era, has spent much of his life as a man of war. His recognition of the enemy's of freedom was sure and certain. His faith in constitutional procedure was never shaken. During the late was Sir Winston Churchill presided over a coalition government, equipped with dictatorial powers, and was scrupulous in his regard for the authorith of the House of Commons.

His political obituary was being written when he had scarcely passed 40. He sat for years in the House, warning of the menace of Nazi-ism, while the big clock above the Speaker's Chair ticked off the wasted hours. He was a lonely but not a bitter man, always enjoying the cut and thrust of parliamentry debate, where no man was his match. When he came to power in the Spring of 1940, he brooked no recrimination about the past, lest the future thereby be lost. He mobilized the English language and sent it into battle, to steady his fellow-countrymen and hearten those Europeans upon whom the long dark night of tyranny had descended. He understood the first principle of war, which is to recognize the enemy; and had Hitler invaded Hell, Mr. Churchill would have found opportunity in the House of Commons to make pasing and not altogether unfavorable reference to the Devil.

He is both a humble and an arrogant man. Once, after a particularly savage right raid on the East End of London, he walked and scrambled over hills of broken brick, through puddles of shattered glass; and the gallant grimy Londoners ceased their digging for buried bodies, and cheered him. And he said with bewilderment in his voice, and tears in his eyes: "They act as though I had brought them a great victory."

I am sure that if he could pluck one year from the incredible eighty, and print it indelibly in the pages of history, he would choose that one year when Britain stood alone, while those who were half asleep became half prepared. He would choose it, not because of his rhetoric, not because of the Battle of Britain, or the steadiness of the civilian population; but rather because democratic processes, the rights of the individual, did not shrivel or shrink even when held so near the fire of total war.

The British Prime Minister is both a gambler and a crying man - Mr. Lincoln did considerable crying too. One of the greatest gambles in the history of warfare occurred in the Autumn of 1940, when he stripped the Island of its pitiful remnants of armor - most of it had been lost at Dunkirk - and shipped it aound the Cape to Egypt.

When the German beam was on London, guiding their bombers in, he would drive up from the country for no other reason than to be there with the other subjects of the King. There was a grim gaity about the man; a certain fascination with physical danger; a restless, roving mind which caused him to be concerned about minute details - memorandum showering right and left, reading : "Pray inform me on this matter within 24 hours" - telephone calls to Cabinet Ministers in the middle of the night. And always the ability to savor and taste a well-turned phrase, to polish it until it would come out in the House of Commons in a fashion described by a friend as a "Thunderous and well-rehearsed improvisation."

When victory had been achieved his fellow-countrymen turned him out to grass. With one brilliant exception he did not complain. His mind had changed on very few subjects, and it was a time of change. He wrote and he painted, and sought power again. Finally it was his. Scarred and toughened as he was by political wars, the charge that hurt most in that last campaign was that he was a man of war not to be trusted with power. He remains the man of war seeking peace. Younger men, waiting for him to lay down the heavy burdens of office, grow old and impatient while waiting/

He moves with uncertain steps; some of the fire has gone from his voice; but his language continues to illuminate the political scene in England and abroad. He said today: "I am now nearing the end of my journey, but I hope I still have some services to render". His services to date have not been inconsiderable, for men who love freedom, and indeed those who now enjoy it, are considerably in his debt. He has enriched our language and fortified our heritage.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a minute with the Word for Today. But first, a word from Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: When the definite history of our times is written, there will be a special place in it for Sir Winston Churchill, who in 1943, speaking of nations as well as individuals, said: "The price of greatness is responsibility." Perhaps Sir Winston was too modest to conclude, as Thomas Fuller once did that "Great hopes make great men." Whatever the case, Will Rogers put it well when he said: "It is great to be great, but it is greater to be human."

Good Night and Good Luck.

I hope you will forgive the belatedness of this note. The holiday season has been such a busy one and I am only now beginning to catch up with my correspondence.

I am delighted to hear that you enjoyed the program we did in commemoration of Sir Winston Churchill's eightieth birthday.

As you can imagine we all had a good time putting the show together, the only difficulty being having to reduce such a wealth of material to a single hour.

What I am really writing you to say is how much I enjoyed your radio programme on Churchill's birthday. From the comments of our listeners, I believe that they felt as I did. It was an excellent job, done as only Ed Murrow seems to be able to do that kind of thing.

Zukor says that Beaverbrook would like very much to hear this show and I am wondering whether we could get a copy of the tape and a simple tape recording play-back so that we could send them over to him for his listening.

I tried to get you on the phone right after the broadcast to tell you that it was an outstanding job. I enjoyed it thoroughly and once again it made me realize how much depth, vision and courage this guy Churchill possesses. I hope you will arrange for him to hear the show. I am sure it would give him great pleasure.

from: Dallas Townsend October 19, 1953

None of us likes to face the fact that Sir Winston Churchill may not live much longer. But faced it has to be, and I am sure you have thought about it more than the rest of us. To prepare for the inevitable, Television News is making up an obituary of Churchill, composed largely of the Prime Minister on film, plus recorded excerpts from his speeches over film of London under the Blitz and other events during World War Two.

In our opinion, this obituary - to have the effect we hope it will have - should conclude with an estimate of Churchill's achievements and his probable place in history. It seems to us that no one is as well qualified to handle this as you are. I do not venture even to suggest what you might say, except that we would like to plan on your doing from three to five minutes. Naturally, we would prefer to have you do it live, but if it would be more convenient for you to film your portion in advance, on a "hold for release" basis, that would be perfectly all right. The obit would logically be carried on the network at some suitable evening period. I hope we may count on you in our planning.

Dear Ed,

I could not bring myself to bind this letter into my Churchill books. Save it for Casey. The old reprobate (not Casey; Churchill) is undeniably a great man, and the value of having known him will increase with the years.

See you soon.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I regret the unavoidable delay in replying to your letter of December 5, but as my Secretary has explained over the telephone, I cannot undertake to broadcast to America on Christmas Day, as you have so kindly suggested. I thank you nevertheless for your courtesy in writing to me.

Yours sincerely,

Winston S. Churchill

Dear Ed:

I am sending you herewith a copy of a letter received from Mr. Churchill's secretary. I hope that you can prevail upon Mr. Churchill when you see him to change his mind.

I still look forward to your being with us during some of our clinics. The West Coast swing was a brilliant success.

Best regards.

Sincerely,

Dear Ed:

We have scheduled clinics (nos. 22 to 26) through August and we look forward to about eight more during 1951 -- probably the northeast in one group and Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas in another. Puerto Rico is set for a single shot in early December.

In 1952 we will start the series all over again, with plans to wind up in a three-day seminar at some mid-west university - possibly Illinois.

If you are back in time, you might like to get a taste of the 1951 series. Otherwise you can have your choice of 1952's most interesting tours.

Hope you have a good vacation and a pleasant visit to the British Isles.

Sincerely,

Carl

Dear Sir,

Mr. Churchill asks me to thank you for your letter of June 25 and for your invitation for him to be the guest of honor and principal speaker at the annual banquet of the Radio Pioneers next April. While he is complimented that you should wish him to come, he has no plans to visit the United States at that time, and therefore much regrets he is unable to accept. Nonetheless, he much appreciates your invitation, which it has given him pleasure to receive.

Yours truly,

/s/ L. M. Marston

Dear Mr. Murrow:

In accordance with your suggestion, I am sending you some information about myself so that you may be able to send on to Lord Beaverbrook any of the facts that you deem to be pertinent.

I am thirty-eight years of age, born in New York City. I am at present a member of the Department of History at Brooklyn College. I have taught at Columbia University and was also Visiting Professor at New York State Teachers College, Fredonia. I received my A.B. from Brooklyn College, and my A.M. and Ph.D. from Columbia. I also have an L.L.B. degree from St. Lawrence University and am a member of the New York Bar. I am, however, not engaged in the practice of law. I was for a time a social worker and also was one time Director of Research for the American Association for Social Security under its executive secretary, Abraham Epstein.

I am the author of State Intervention in Great Britain — copy on shelf and of articles and reviews including, among others, articles in Collier's Encyclopedia, an article entitled Diagnosing the German Malady, which has been reprinted in the Making of Modern Europe, and an article on Winston Churchill, which is to appear later this year in a volume on British Historians: Essays in honor of Professor Robert Livingston Schuyler, President of the American Historical Association.

I have also engaged in research and editorial work and I am at present associated with Quincy Howe in connection with his three-volume work, World History of Our Times.

My interest in David Lloyd George grows out of my work in twentieth century history. I view Lloyd George as a prototype of the modern politician (or statesman) in the age of mass communication, universal suffrage, and general literacy.

I want to thank you again for your courtesy and interest. I am most grateful to you for providing me with the possibility of getting access to the Lloyd George papers. I would be most happy to send you any other information about myself or my thoughts on the Lloyd George biography. I have read practically all of the relevant printed material, but I have seen little in the way of manuscripts.

I am taking the liberty of sending, under separate cover, a copy of my State Intervention in Great Britain. I am not sure that Lord Beaverbrook would like the work, though I quote from his Politicians and the War, at least once (on p.79). I am enclosing a carbon copy of the Winston Churchill article. I will send you a copy of the published work as soon as I have one.

Many thanks again for your kindness. My best wishes for a happy holiday.

Sincerely,

WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL

To reverse one of his malicious phrases ("Mr. Atlee is a modest man and he has much to be modest about"), Winston Spencer Churchill is a very immodest man and he has indeed much to be immodest about. Soldier, journalist, lecturer, ruler of the King's Navy, of the Army, and of the country, bricklayer, painter, politician and statesman, and historian too, Churchill has enjoyed, and the word is used advisedly, a very full and successful life.

Like other charismatic heroes, Churchill believes that he is a man of destiny. Though ours is not the best of all possible worlds, Churchill believes that, for him at least, everything in it has been for the best--certainly in the telling. To earlier generations, the days of wrath inflicted upon God's children served as a test of faith; in the crucible of misfortune the dross is purged away and the true believer stands out tempered and refined. Churchill, however, has never looked upon bad fortune as a trial of men's souls, but rather as an invisible web of circumstances so devised as to enable him, the individual, to play his fated role.

Even seeming personal misfortune and "great mistakes" have always turned out for the best. Too "stupid" to learn Latin and Greek, held back in the lowest form at Harrow, Churchill was taught English while brighter boys were winning prizes for Latin poetry and Greek epigrams--but neglecting the English they needed "to earn their living or make their way."[1] He was captured by the Boers, but instead of being cut off from the whole "exciting war with all its boundless possibilities of adventure and advancement," he made his escape, and thus gained "a public reputation or notoriety" which he well knew how to exploit. In later years, intermittent political exile was always turned to pecuniary gain ~~and to political advantage. In his narration of the events of the~~

and to political advantage. His exclusion from the Conservative Government in 1935 was in the best Churchillian tradition of good fortune. "I can see how lucky I was. Over me beat invisible wings."[2]

In his narration of the events of the spring and summer of 1940, when the invasion of Britain seemed imminent, he does not conceal his regret that Hitler dared not follow through with his worst. Wasted--except in the telling--was the slogan he had carefully prepared for the occasion: "You can always take one with you." Ruined was his calculation that the ensuing butchery would bring the United States immediately into the conflict. For Churchill is not merely prepared to accept misfortune in order to convert it into good fortune; he is ready to go much further--even to create misfortune, to provide the conditions of disaster, as a gambit to achieve victory. Yet all turned out for the best: Hitler veered Eastward and brought Russia into the war. Nor did Tojo fail him. The attack on Pearl Harbor saved Britain "from the awful danger" that Japan would attack only British or Dutch possessions in the Far East, and that "in consequence Congress would not sanction an American declaration of War." Delivered by Japanese treachery, Churchill "slept the sleep of the saved." Earlier, the German invasion of Norway had ended the "trance" which "had proved most harmful to the Allies", and, best of all, made Churchill Prime Minister. "I was conscious of a profound sense of relief... I felt as if I were walking with Destiny, and that all my past life had been but a preparation for this hour and for this trial... Therefore although impatient for the morning, I slept soundly and had no need for cheering dreams. Facts are better than dreams."[3]

This favored child of fortune was born on November 30, 1874 to Randolph Churchill, a son of the seventh Duke of Marlborough, and to his beautiful and wealthy American bride, the former Jennie Jerome. Winston Churchill grew up under the care of the traditionally devoted nurse, his "dearest and most intimate friend," who tended all his wants, the "confidante" to whom he poured out his "many troubles." His mother, he tells us, "shone for me like the Evening Star. I loved her dearly--but at a distance." Nor could he penetrate the armor of dignity and reticence which his dazzling father wore "before strangers, children, and servants." Lord Randolph was "immediately offended" at "the slightest idea of comradeship" and, when his son offered to serve as assistant private secretary, "froze" him "into stone." The scion of the great Duke of Marlborough expected little from his own eldest son. Winston, a very backward pupil at Harrow, barely had passed the entrance examinations for Sandhurst, and only after the third try. Seemingly Lord Randolph Churchill had good reason at this time to warn his son of the danger of becoming a social wastrel.

Thirty-five years later, Churchill recalled the incident with relish, for, though he is filled with awe when he surveys himself and his accomplishments, he does not, like Sir Thomas Browne, consider himself a miracle. Proud as he is of his ducal descent, he is even prouder that, "Everything I have got I worked for."

Entrance into military school ended a wretched interlude, a "barren and unhappy period of my life...a sombre gray patch upon the chart of my journey. It was an unending spell of worries that did not seem petty, and of toil uncheered by fruition; a time of discomfort, restriction, and purposeless monotony." Yet, in retrospect, this too was all for the best. Churchill was undoubtedly thinking of his own youth when, in explaining the success of John, first Duke of Marlborough (like himself, the son of a brilliant and promising failure), he wrote that "famous men are usually the product of unhappy childhood. The stern compression of circumstances, the twinges of adversity, the spur of slights and taunts in early years are needed to evoke that ruthless fixity of purpose and tenacious mother wit without which great actions are seldom accomplished."[4]

When he left Sandhurst, the world "opened like Aladdin's Cave... I have been happier every year since I became a man...An endless moving picture in which one was an actor...Great Fun!...All the days were good and each day was better than the other." Grateful "for the gift of existence", he assures us that, if he had his life to live over again, it would not be different.

He went to Kipling's India, as a subaltern, "living all day long" for the evening polo. Unlike Kipling's subalterns, he also turned to reading. Questions about ethics, the Socratic method, and other abstruse matters intruded on his leisure during the long afternoons when it was too hot to play polo, and he resolved "to read history, philosophy, economics, and things like that." He began with Gibbon and "rode triumphantly through it from end to end." He went on to Macaulay, "with his captivating style and devastating self-confidence," to whom, despite his later criticism of this "prince of literary rogues," he acknowledges an "immense debt." The influence of Gibbon and Macaulay never wore off. Churchill always had a "liking for words", using them, he admits, rather indiscriminately and without learning their meaning. He studied books of quotations intently, for "quotations when engraved upon the memory give you good thoughts."

While still in the Army, he became a war correspondent and in 1898 published his first book, The Malakand Field Force, which was based upon his newspaper dispatches reporting an action against Pathan frontier tribesmen. He now devoted himself to writing with the same zest with which he had taken up soldiering, reading, and learning to drink whiskey in the tropics like an English gentleman. Savrola, a novel which he now urges his friends to avoid, netted him over £700 in a few years, and convinced him that writing was both a "splendid" way of making a living and of "asserting" himself. "I would free myself from all discipline and authority with nobody to give me orders..."

He resolved to enter Parliament and to earn his way with his pen, but tarried to play polo and to serve under Kitchener in the Sudan Campaign. At the same time he busied himself in writing about the Campaign; The River War, a two-volume work in which he tried to embody all the material available on the subject. "I affected a combination of the style of Macaulay and Gibbon, the staccato antithesis of the former and the rolling sentences and genitival endings of the latter; and I stuck in a bit of my own from time to time...I already knew that chronology is the key to easy narrative...Writing a book is not unlike...planning a battle or painting a picture...the whole when finished is only a successful presentation of a theme. In battles however, the other fellow interferes all the time..." 5.

In 1899, at the age of twenty-four, he became the highest-paid war correspodent in Britain, covering the Boer War at a salary of £250 per month plus expenses. "Journalism requires advertisement," he has said, and his capture by the Boers and his melodramatic escape made him a popular hero and insured his journalistic success. Capitalizing on his fame, he sought and won election to Parliament as a Conservative in the Khaki Election of 1900, and immediately left on an extensive lecture tour, visiting the United States and Canada. Henceforth he was rarely to be out of the news.

In Parliament Churchill became increasingly restive as a member of the Conservative Party and soon swung over to the Liberals on the tariff issue. He combined literary activities with his Parliamentary duties, and by 1908, when he became a member of the Liberal Cabinet, he was already the author of a number of works, including additional war books and a "standard" two-volume biography of his father.

It is a wondrous experience to read these books published forty and fifty years ago. Time has taken its toll, but little about Churchill has changed. "It is better to be making the news than taking it; to be an actor rather than a critic." He affirms his credo, borrowed from Machiavelli: "...It is better to be impetuous than cautious. For Fortune is a woman who to be kept under must be beaten and roughly handled; ...she suffers herself to be more readily mastered by those who treat her so, than by those who are timid...and always, like a woman she favors the...less scrupulous and fiercer...A bold heart, a true eye...leading...."[6] His vitality, his zest for adventure and for flamboyant expression, are all there. The influence of Gibbon and Macaulay is so pronounced that some paragraphs read like parodies. Touches of Kipling, of Tennyson, of Omar Khayam, of Shakespeare, and of Byron--apparently culled from Bartlett--add piquancy, though sometimes giving the effect of a string of quotations. Churchill had many "good thoughts" and expressions--though not always quite original. The "war" books are clear and vivid, the material well arranged and forcefully presented. His descriptions of the Indian and South African campaigns rival any in his later Marlborough, The World Crisis, or The Second World War. More limited in scope, with less of the political story that was later to occupy him, these early works are models of military narrative. If his accounts are overdrawn, his enthusiasm is nevertheless infectious, and his pageantry colorful. Much of it is, in the words of an early friendly critic, Bop, Bop, Bang, but its appeal to the age that celebrated the Diamond Jubilee was unmistakeable. Kipling's generation was drawn to the Imperialist, who admired "the perseverance of a vigorous race who pursue their policies in spite of delay and disaster to victorious ends," and who viewed with disdain the untutored savages with unpronounceable names ("another pestilent tribe, whose name alone is an infliction"). It was journalism, at its most popular, if not at its best.

His two-volume life of his father was in the classical tradition of the time. Winston Churchill makes much known about his father: his sppeches, his letters, his interviews, his personality. All this is useful, if not indispensable, as a record. But nowhere in the two volumes does there emerge, nor can the reader even reconstruct, a coherent story of what made Randolph Churchill what he was and what impelled him to do what he did. Certainly the written record was available: "Nothing that related to politics, whether creditable or not, whether important or petty, seems to have been excluded from his [Randolph Churchill's] archives." The rhetoric is there, both of father and of son, and so are occasionally brilliant insights, even a dim consciousness of the times. Yet in a fundamental sense it is not a biography, nor is it history. Seldom does Churchill ask "how", rarely "why", and he never tries to answer. In 1873, Randolph Churchill could, with every evidence of sincerity, write to his fiancee: "public life has no great charms for me, as I am naturally very quiet, and hate bother and publicity...." The biographer quotes, and the reader is intrigued, for certainly few men have acted so at variance with their words, but no attempt is made to show the forces of personality or of events that enabled Randolph Churchill to compel attention. Perhaps "no one could guess beforehand what he was going to say nor how he would say it," but certainly it is the duty of the historian or of the biographer to explain why he did. Churchill will not attempt this task. His but to narrate, with often brilliant asides, but never to go behind the scenes. The great admirer of Tennyson acts like the Light Brigade, his not to reason why.

Unable to explain personality or events, Churchill is best able to dramatize them. His description of the Gladstone Cabinet of 1882-1885, written in 1906, impressionistic and overdrawn as it is, evokes the mood of the following decade of that liberal pre-war period in which he was to play a prominent role:

> It was the end of an epoch; the long dominion of the middle classes, which had begun in 1832 had come to its close and with it the almost equal reign > of Liberalism. The great victories had been won. All sorts of lumbering tyrannies had been toppled over. Authority was everywhere broken. Slaves were free. Conscience was free. Trade was free. But hunger and squalor and cold were also free and the people demanded something more than liberty. The old watchwords still rang true; but they were not enough. And how to fill the void was the riddle that split the Liberal party. It happened, moreover, that at this very time, already so critical, a Liberal Government had been forced to deal with all kinds of affairs for the effecient conduct of which their formulas furnished no clue. They were compelled to intervene by force of arms..., to repress popular movements, to banish popular leaders, to hang revolutionaries, to devise ingenious instruments of coercion, to mutilate Parliamentary procedure... And thus, while half the Cabinet were ransacking the past for weapons of Executive authority, others were groping dimly towards a vague Utopia. 7.

It is significant that Churchill has not attempted a history ofthe Liberal era that ended with the coming of the War in 1914. He has, however, utilized the experience and knowledge gained as First Lord of the Admiralty, as Minister of Munitions, and as Secretary for War, to write of the war itself. Thrust out of office on the dissolution of the Coalition in 1922, even losing his seat in Parliament, he strove for vindication. Blamed for his part in the making of history, he sought to square the account by writing a multi-volume story of the First World War and of his part in it. The pen would restore the reputation the sword had lost. Churchill, like Disraeli, knows that "with words we govern men." Refusing to be consigned to limbo by the prevailing mood of post-war disillusionment, Churchill proceeded to present to the judgment of his country men his apologia pro vita sua. As H.G. Wells has said, "his imagination is obsessed... Before all things he desires a dramatic world with villans-- and one hero." After the fashion of Defoe's Memoirs of a Cavalier, Churchill's "contribution to history" hangs "the chronicle and discussion of great military and political events upon the thread of the personal experiences of an individual." He was impressed by "the example of so great a master of narrative," but it is of interest that Churchill should take as his model one who was also a master of fictive biography and history.

Undoubtedly, The World Crisis compares favorably with other accounts of the First World War. Faced with a situation so vast and so complex, historians no less than rulers have found themselves at a loss. Churchill ~~(has failed to present a coherent account although he sought,~~ ~~he sought~~ essayed "to find and follow stepping stones of fate. I set myself at each stage to answer the questions, 'What happened and why?' I seek to guide the reader to those points where the course of events is being decided...."[8] But only the reader who can accept the author's evaluation of his own importance, will feel that the aim has been achieved. The account "will follow throughout," the author promised, "The pathway on which footsteps were decisive." In the vast tangle of arguments, here will be found the unraveling thread. In the clash, overbalancing or equipoise of gigantic forces, here were the determining factors. Amid increasing chaos here lay the potential dominants."[9] Alas, the sole "unraveling thread" which Winston Churchill presents is Winston Churchill!

Perhaps not every man is his own historian, but every man may make history: "No one can tell that he may not some day set a stone rolling or take or neglect some ordinary step which in its consequences will alter the history of the world." Other people may not be able to tell, but Churchill makes it plain that, at least in retrospect, he can. No sooner did he lose favor in the British Government than mankind seems to have lost control over events. "Thereafter [after the middle of 1915] events passed very largely outside the scope of conscious choice. Governments and individuals conformed to the rhythm of the tragedy and swayed and staggered forward in helpless violence."

The World Crisis is bombastic, confused, at times even absurd. Churchill's overriding concern with himself often distracts the reader from the story to the author. Nevertheless, certain phrases, sentences, paragraphs, even whole pages will deservedly be read for long to come. Though he is more stirred by the magnificence of war than by its tragedy, and though there is much puffing and blowing which does not always leave the reader as breathless as it leaves the author, Churchill does convey a sense of drama of events, and uses his gift of eloquence to present a brilliant, even gorgeous pageant. Though the reader is made dizzy by the author's ubiquitousness and appalled by his keen appreciation of his own qualities, Churchill is so charmed with himself that he charms the reader. Churchill, the orator, often seems to pause for cheers, and at times the audience is indeed moved to applause. Even the cold and cynical Balfour was fascinated by "Winston's brilliant Autobiography disguised as a history of the universe."[11] Israel Zangwill's comment on G.B. Shaw is very apt: "In these days when so few men believe in any god at all, it is refreshing to find a man believing so much in himself." Above all, the spirit of the work is redeemed by an Elizabethan gusto, by an exhilaration, an unfaltering energy which fully matches the actions and events that it records. If we cannot participate in these great actions directly, we can at least appreciate the grandeur of the splendid vista limned in such flaming colors. Danger is exhilarating and Churchill's exhuberance and his graphic account transport the reader to that land of fancy where man, in his dreams of glory, ever strays.

Churchill's volumes are spiced with maxims, notions, and descriptions, that, often despite their extravagance and perhaps sometimes because of it, are tempting to quote. His description of Lenin is full of sound and fury: "Implacable vengeance, rising from a frozen pity in a tranquil, sensible, matter-of-fact, good humoured integument. His weapon logic; his mood opportunist. His sympathies cold and wide as the Arctic Ocean; his hatred tight as the hangman's noose."[11] Churchill's rhetoric is so rich that its organ tones often drown out the sense. Yet despite many passages of resonant absurdity, it would be an injustice to ignore his frquently pithy and trenchant observations on men and things. Witness his observations on the danger of holding high office:

> The temptation to tell as Chief in a great position the things he likes most to hear is one of the commonest explanations of mistaken policy. (He)... is in the main surrounded by smiling and respectful faces. Most people who come in contact with him in times of strain feel honoured by contact with so much power or in sympathy with the bearer of such burdens. They are often prompted to use smooth processes, to mention some favourable items, to leave unsaid some ugly misgivings or some awkward contradiction. Thus the outlook of the leader on whose decision fateful events depend is usually far more sanguine than the brutal facts admit.[12]

No one has better summed up the underlying--and confused--strategical problem of the war: "...Military policy oscillated throughout... between two opposed conceptions of strategy... To attack the strong or to attack the weak." No one better or so tersely summed up the breakdown of all moral values in the effort to achieve victory: "When all was over, torture and cannibalism were the only two expedients that the civilized, scientific, Christian States had been able to deny themselves; and these were of doubtful utility." His cold comment on the art of generalship should be engraved on the portals of all military academies: "Battles are won by slaughter and manoeuvre; the greater the general, the more he contributes to manoeuvre, the less he demands in slaughter." The costs of the war are soberly presented: "Before the war, it had seemed incredible that such terrors and slaughters, even if they began, could last more than a few months. After the first two years it was difficult to believe that they would ever end... Victory was to be bought so dearly as to be almost indistinguishable from defeat."[13]

Churchill wrote the major part of The World Crisis during his Parliamentary exile but completed it amidst the distractions of holding office in the Baldwin Government of 1924. The cares of office robbed him of time and the inclination to embark on new studies. Once again, however, the fates were kind to Churchill. Cast out of office with his colleagues in 1929, he set about the grand project, in which he had extensive research assistance, of rehabilitating the reputation of his illustrious ancestor, John, First Duke of Marlborough. The first volume of Marlborough, His Life and Times was published in 1933; the sixth and last volume appeared in 1938. Swift, Pope, Thackeray, and Macaulay had written critically of Marlborough; Churchill contested them all, and especially Macaulay, to whom he admittedly owed so much. He did not succeed, however, in fundamentally modifying Macaulay's portrait.

Macaulay had granted Marlborough his historical due but had painted him warts and all. To Churchill, the Duke was "the first of English soldiers and a chief Architect of Britain's imperial power;... to pretend that the triumphs of England in the age of Anne were the sole work of Marlborough would be an exaggeration. But it would only be an exaggeration." Churchill must have Marlborough not merely as a Titan, ("that is not disputed") but also as "a virtuous and benevolent being," who "possessed to a degree almost sublime the prosaic gift of common sense... He made up his mind with cold, human sagacity and a profound weighing of all the largest and smallest circumstances." Well he should, for "he thought for all, he acted for all." Even his use of English was "worthy of Shakespears."

At the same time Churchill acknowledged some of Marlborough's blemishes. "He was a greater worker than man... No one can read without regret and repugnance the long wearisome tale of the frauds and injuries which Marlborough perpetrated..." But whereas Marlborough's frailties provided Macaulay with an opportunity for literary expression and emphasis which he did not hesitate to exploit, Churchill seeks to explain them away. He cannot deny Marlborough's avarice, but as its motivation was the elevation of his family, avarice becomes a virtue. Churchill explained Marlborough's war-time haggling with England's deadly enemy, Louis XIV : "Marlborough was not to be bought for money. He could accept it as a reward, but not as an inducement." Young John became the lover of the Duchess of Cleveland, mistress of James II. She was considerably older than John and paid him well. But they were cousins: "kinship...sanctioned intimacy and did not prohibit passion. Affections, affinities, and attractions were combined. Desire walked with opportunity and neither was denied." Macaulay viewed the situation unkindly, but he was incapable of understanding affairs of the heart for, as Churchill charges, to Macaulay love was "a localized aberration which distorts judgement" instead of "a sublime passion whcih expresses and animates all things."

Churchill presented the facts in narrative style but without adequate analysis. He made no attempt to dredge below the surface of events, no inquiry into how society lived, how it operated beneath the gorgeous panopoly. He was content with rich daubs of color, the slap-dash of the amateur artist. The panorama is not that of workaday life, in days of old, but of knights who were bold. The book is replete with the usually vivid portraitures and impressionistic imagery.

Churchill has elsewhere said that to him history is made by the "glorious few", the "exceptional human beings, whose thoughts, actions, qualities, virtues, triumphs, weaknesses, and crimes have dominated the fortunes of the race," not "the anonymous innumerable many."[16] The great villain is now Louis XIV, "petty and mediocre in all except his lusts of power," but also, oddly enough, "masterful, competent, hard-working." Anne is summed up as "a great queen," not "because of her benevolence or her understanding...certainly not because of her right judgement--but because of her toughness and will power." George I is described as "a narrow, vindictive, humdrum German martinet, with dull brains, coarse tastes ("he brought with him a pair of ugly and rapacious German mistresses"), crude appetites; a commonplace and ungenerous ruler, and [this above all!] a sluggish and incompetent commander in the field..." Poland was "a large, unkempt, slatternly Kingdom;" Spain was "in decrepitude, insolvent, incoherent, tracing her genealogies and telling her beads;" the Dutch Republic was "the most perfect manifestation of obstinacy--constitutuional, moral, temperamental...Obstinacy, stolid, valiant, harsh, even brutal, dwelt in every fibre of the nation..." Unable to improve on the Duke of Buckingham's rhetoric, Churchill is content to quote Buckingham's plaint after being dismissed from office:

> "Good God, how has this poor nation been governed in my time! During the reign of King Charles the Second we were governed by a parcel of French whores; in King James the Second's time by a parcel of Popish Priest's; in King William's time by a parcel of Dutch Footmen; and now we are governed by a dirty chambermaid, a Welsh attorney and a profligate wretch that has neither honour nor honesty![17]

Unhappy on his back-bench, Churchill compared the age of Marlborough with his own and, as was to be expected, found the present wanting. His thoughts on the present discontents are reflected in his bitterness with an age that had become impersonal, mechanical, and materialistic. How he yearned for the olden days! He does not conceal his nostalgia for war and military glory: "Battles are the principal milestones in secular history. Modern opinion resents this uninspiring truth, and historians often treat the decisions of the field as incidents in the dramas of politics and diplomacy." In the age of the warrior hero, personal courage and perseverance were the highest good. For "all the great struggles of history have been won by superior willpower wresting victory in the teeth of odds." They still are. The slogan, he cries, is: "Fight on."[18]

Yet, apparently courage and striving are not enough. It was as true of Churchill himself as of Marlborough that he "was capable of enduring endless vexations and out facing extreme hazards. But he had one sensitive spot....He sought not only glory but appreciation." More than ten eventful years later, Churchill was to write about himself: "I acquired [in 1940] the chief power in the State which...I wielded in ever growing measure for five years and three months of World War at the end of which time, all our enemies having surrendered unconditionally, or being about to do so, I was immediately dismissed by the British electorate from all conduct of their affairs."

While writing Marlborough, Churchill published two volumes of collected essays, Thoughts and Adventures, (1932), (appearing in the United States as Amid These Storms), and Great Contemporaries (1937). Many of these essays are merely"pot-boilers," though Great Contemporaries contains some interesting sketches. It is hardly true, however, that "taken together they...present not only the actors but the scene... the stepping stone of historical narrative." By the outbreak of the Second World War he had also managed to complete the History of the English Speaking Peoples, which, he promises, "will some day be published."

The coming of war in 1939 provided him once again with the opportunity to make history. Like Lenin, who left off writing about revolution to make one, Churchill preferred to make wars rather than to write of them, to be maker rather than a writer of history. Recalled to office as First Lord of the Admiralty, he soon attained, for the first time in his long and ambitious career, the position of His Majesty's First Servant, a post he held until the 1945 General Election. Once the military crisis was past, the British electorate apparently believed, as Bonar Law had phrased it a quarter of a century earlier, that a "drummer boy who had been an asset in the hour of battle, was now a nuisance among the casualties in the hospital ward."

The sequel was inevitable: once again he became the recorder. He had prepared himself for the task by keeping careful records of the War Years. During his five years as Prime Minister he had issued memoranda, orders, and directives and kept minutes that amounted to nearly a million words in all. Here was the raw material of history. Even before becoming Prime Minister, he had sent Chamberlain a series of daily letters on the problems presented by the War. The long-suffering Chamberlain at last became exasperated by Churchill's "I hope you will consider carefully what I write to you," and finally pointed out in writing that, after all, he was seeing Churchill every day and felt that formal replies were hardly necessary.

The Second World War, four volumes of which have already been published, is offered as a "contribution to history," as a record of thirty years of "action and advocacy which comprise and express my life-effort." Churchill assures us that he is "content to be judged upon them." History, however, does not judge a man at his own evaluation and it will certainly consider, also, the decade that Churchill significantly omits from consideration, the decade from 1905-1914, when he and Lloyd George were the great "radicals" in the Liberal Government, under which a united Britain entered on the war.

With characteristic immodesty, he equates his own "action and advocacy" with history. As always, the data are focused on Churchill the Statesman and Wise Leader. Along with the enthusiasm and delight with which he presents himself to posterity is his constant concern to play his self-appointed role. Mr. Churchill, Leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, may not be quite able to recall his emotions in tranquillity, but he betrays nothing but satisfaction with himself and his accomplishments. While it would be churlish to begrudge him all the credit he accords himself, it is impossible not to admire his artistry in the use of whitewash, the skill with which he manages to ignore or to overcome the record of the many mistakes which haunt his ambitions. More than forty years of political experience have taught him never to acknowledge failure, never to admit a mistake. ~~He has never repented his performance in the House of Commons back in 1906, when he confessed to "terminological inexactitudes."~~

Once again recur the brilliant passages and memorable scenes, epigrams, and maxims; once again one feels a well-nigh irresistible temptation to quote. His trenchant descriptions of Baldwin and Chamberlain merit quotation in any history of the era. Baldwin "knew little of Europe and disliked what he knew....He had a genius for waiting upon events and an imperturbability under adverse criticism. He was singularly adroit in letting events work for him and capable of seizing the right moment when it came....Neville Chamberlain on the other hand was alert, business-like, opinionated and self-confident in a very high degree. Unlike Baldwin, he conceived himself able to comprehend the whole field of Europe and indeed the world....Mr. Chamberlain continued to believe that he had only to form a personal contact with the Dictators to effect marked improvement in the world situation." There is also the story of Anthony Eden expressing his misgivings about the situation and of Chamberlain telling him to "go home and take an aspirin."

The weakness of The Second World War is that, despite the fact that its author has been closer to the center of political action and military strategy, it lacks the narrative virtue of the first series. With all the advantages inherent in his position, Churchill fails in the first obligation of the historian, he fails to give us a coherent account of the past. Instead, and this has become increasingly evident as volume succeeds volume, Churchill relies upon his files, content to provide us with the scrap books and recollections, substituting reminiscences for narration. What he presents to us, more and more, is a series of documents linked, more or less successfully, by a few lines of text. Memoranda, minutes, letters, telegrams, and speeches, are strung together and quoted at length though necessarily, and oftentimes unfortunately with many omissions. Possibly, with advancing years, Churchill may have decided that he must conserve his energy for other tasks which he expects to be "thrust upon him," but, since he is never one to spare himself, it is more likely that he is seeking to demonstrate to his readers the basis for what he seems to regard as an inescapable conclusion, that he has had no misgivings, has made no mistakes, did the right thing always, and at the right time. Churchill is his own hero and he never falls below the level of his idolatory. Apropos of a letter he had written on April 2,1941 to Japan's Foreign Secretary, Yosuke Matsuoka, he remarks, "I was rather pleased with this when I wrote it and I don't mind the look of it now," it is a comment that might apply to all his actions, words, and thoughts. Like the Lord in Genesis, Churchill looks to his work an finds it good.

In peace and in war, history to Churchill is primarily, if not exclusively, a matter of dynasties, cabinets, generals--and Churchills. Not that he is entirely indifferent to the condition of the people--numerous memoranda which he resurrects attest to his concern, but the interest is that of a magnanimous aristocrat troubled by the unfortunate plight of the lower orders. Similarly, in the midst of terrible events he found time to be concerned over the condition of the flag flying atop the Admiralty, and penned a note to the First Lord, ordering him to put up a new flag because: "It grieves me to see the present dingy object every morning."

Churchill the historian is Churchill the man. Blessed with a sense of heritage, as well as with vision and ability, Churchill was born too late. What he wrote of war reflects his fundamental attitude in peace: "From the moment Democracy was admitted to, or rather forced itself upon the battlefield, war ceased to be a gentleman's game. To Hell with it." But the son who on his father's death had resolved that, "There remained only for me to pursue his aims and vindicate his memory," was not free, in the age of Democracy, to follow his inclinations. Churchill might write, in the biography of his father, "There is an England which stretches far beyond the well-drilled masses who are assembled by party machinery to salute with appropriate acclamation the utterances of their recognized fuglemen; an England of wise men who gaze without self-deception at the failings and follies of both political parties; of brave and earnest men." It was to that England that Randolph Churchill had appealed -- and had failed. Winston Churchill also would have preferred to appeal to that England. But that road led to disaster, and he was determined to succeed. Undoubtedly one of the foremost politicians of his time, he wasted no sympathy on "persons of exquisite sensibility," who are shocked by modern politics and who are inclined to "sniff disdainfully...and to console themselves for a lack of influence upon the course of events by the indulgence of a fastidious refinement and a meticulous consistency." The politician of the modern age, whatever his longing for the past, when England was "governed by the few -- the very few" cannot, without courting certain failure, ignore Burke's "swinish multitude."

Unquenchable ambition has forced Churchill to make concessions to the demands of the age, and his tireless energy and industry have enabled him to cope with the forces of Democracy, but he has no basic sympathy for the goals of Democracy. He might proclaim that Hitler "could not comprehend the forces of our island people" who "had come through the centuries to regard Victory as their birthright," but he himself could not quite comprehend that by 1945 the British people had come to regard victory over poverty - or at least "fair shares for all" - as also their birthright. Though he has been forced to bow to Democracy in political life, no such necessity has existed for him as an historian. His values shine forth without obscuring modifications of compromise. Here, clearly, is revealed his lack of genuine feeling for the man in the street, in the field, in the factory, and in the fox-holes. Here lies his real failure as an historian of the modern age.

WINSTON CHURCHILL STRESSES NECESSITY OF NATIONAL DEFENSE IN CBS BROADCAST (Tuesday, January 16)

The Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill stressed the necessity of national defense in a talk on "Whither Britain?", broadcast from London, England over WABC and the Columbia Broadcasting System, Tuesday, January 16, from 3:30 to 4:00 P.M., EST. The British statesman defended the system of parliamentary government, surveyed Britain's economic progress in the past few years, and pleaded for cooperation with the League of Nations.

Churchill's talk was one in a special series of international broadcasts presenting prominent English speakers on the same subject. The complete text of his remarks follows:

HON. WINSTON CHURCHILL: I am very glad to have the chance of speaking to you all about the affairs and future of our country. We have to ask ourselves tonight, two questions: Where do we stand? What ought we to do? My time is so short, I can only deal with a few big things and can only tell you what I think about them without arguing them out as I should like to do. What I say, will not, perhaps, be pleasing to Prime Minister Macdonald nor the opposition party. I really ought to count how many of these there were -- at any rate, I am sure no one will send me a bouquet tomorrow morning. Still, as you sit around your fireside, wondering how it is all going to turn out and what you can do to help old England, I hope you will listen to my advice and if you do not agree with what I say, I trust you will think it over.

First of all, it seems to me that we have much to be thankful for. We have been brought safely through the fires of Armageddon, and now in this great world depression, we are not only holding our place but we are doing better than almost any other country. Our finances have been put back into much better order and though we are not paying off our debts, at any rate we are paying our way, which is much more than the Americans or the Germans or the French have done.

What a comfort it is to think that there are over 700,000 more men at work now than there were last year. I rejoicedat that at Christmas time. I ask you to give a cheer for the health and the giant strength of our wonderful Nation, amid all the economic trials and problems of this modern world. Surely, recognition is also due to the Government which has presided over this great improvement and aided it in some respects by important factions.

But more than that, more than this economic aspect, more than this material side, we have preserved so far the rights and freedom of our men and women and the existence of our Parliament during the time when in every other country such things have been trampled down by tyranny and dictatorship. We have preserved the decencies and the tolerances, the stability and the dignity of our Island life which our forefathers gained for us by their wisdom and hardy courage. We have preserved them while almost everywhere beyond our shores there is a very different scene. Look where you will, over this confused, tumultous world, and you will find no land where thought and action is so free, where property is so respected, where the courts of law and the Government are so free from corruption, where there is less class hatred or where more money is spent or more pains taken to deal with suffering and misfortune. Britain has so far proved herself able to come through the storms of war and peace and tonight, now, here, we still have the power to choose our destiny and to clear a broad, sure high road for our children to

What then are we to do? The world around us has changed greatly and is changing fast. Much has happened which does not help our country. Gone, far gone, are the palmy days of Queen Victoria, when we manufactured the goods and our ships carried them for nearly all the world, in days before the airplane and submarine had been invented, in days when Britannia ruled the waves and we were safe in our Island home. There is no doubt now that we are faced with many dangers.

First, there is the danger of war. You see what is happening between Russia, China and Japan and the tremendous strides, accomplished by trade and by the sword that the japanese people are making and are going to continue to make. We have our interests there, large interests. Some of you will say, "Well, that's all along way off." But what is happening in Europe is not a long way off. This is quite close. It is only a few hours away. Anyone can see what is going on there. I say surely we ought to put our defences in such a state that we can, if we choose, live our own life in our own way and develop our own country and its great possessions. We have never been so defenseless as we are now.

When the Great War broke out, in August 1914, I was at the Admiralty. In those days you could send a whole army out of the country if you wished. Our great Admiral said, "The fleet is ready and we can guarantee the Island against invasion or starvation." That was a considerable undertaking but it was made good by the Royal Navy. No one can say that now. The hideous curse of war from the air has fallen upon the world and I say to you, don't you think we ought to make ourselves as strong against attack from the air as our Navy used to make us from invasion across the sea. We used to say that we would have a navy stronger than that of any two powers. What we ought to do now is to have an airport. That is my point of view. I do not believe we should be in danger. Till we have that, we are no longer the same kind of independent country that we used to be, that any of you were born into. With all our wealth and civilization exposed to the ferocious interests that tear the continent of Europe, we have nothing but our diplomacy and our good intention. I am all for diplomacy and good intention but, first of all, we ought to make the Island safe.

Our finances are sound. We have the best record in the world. No one can make such fine machinery as we. We breed a type of young man nursed in freedom, who will do all required of him. Even if having a one-power standard in the air should make more work for builders, engineers and skilled men unemployed, I think we could put up with that.

But that is not all we ought to do. We ought to have a clear, honest foreign policy which anybody can explain and everybody can understand. Mr. Wells whom you heard last week, sneered at the League of Nations. He is one of those visionaries who are always talking about a world state and a planned destiny and a new order of society and then when any practical steps are taken to urge those very remote ideas, he is one of those who is first to come forward to pick them to pieces, to point out their shortcomings and to mock at them. I don't agree with those who say that the League of Nations is no use and could never prevent another European war. It may be indeed the only chance of preventing one or if it cannot prevent it, of making sure that the guilty disturber of the peace get the worst of it. If the League of Nations is not close enough involved in the intrigue about disarmament, it might still remain an august tribunal to which not only the powers of small people may use, if not for protection, at any rate for a declaration of where right and justice lie.

It would indeed be a melancholy ending to the hopes of those who strive for peace and for justice, which is higher than peace, if that great instrument of the public opinion of the world and of the public law of Europe were to flounder in increasing disorder of the age. We must take our place there and do our duty with the other countries large and small, not only those countries which fought in the late War but the neutral countries like Holland, Denmark, Sweden and Switzerland, we must bear our share in building up a confederation of nations so strong and sincere that in Europe, at least, no aggressor will dare to challenge.

No doubt, my friends, there are dangers in every course but it is a wise saying, that there is safety in numbers and I believe that we must not desert the League of Nations but rather make it plain that we intend to play our part there and do our duty there, be it what or be it who.

Now I come back home to our own country and to its troubles and hopes. It is not true, as Mr. Wells suggested, that the world is getting poorer, or that our standard of living here is getting worse. Life in the cottage home is not getting better as quickly as it ought, or perhaps that it might, but it is better than it was and it is better than it was even before the War and if we pull together there is no reason why there should not be a continuous improvement. The cause of this world depression is not famine or scarcity; it is in our power to supply our wants more abundantly than under the old arrangements. The problem now is to save. Find out the answer to that and I believe it is certainly not by the Russian brand of exploitation, exploiting hatreds and sharing misery.

Look at the Minister of Agriculture, that able man, crying out against the extra pigs and milk and eggs as the result of his experiment last year in England. Fancy that! While at the same time his colleague, the Minister of Health, in a building a few hundred yards away is making scientific calculations to find out exactly what is the very least food - vitamines and proteins and all that learned jargon - that will keep an unemployed man and his family alive, per week and per diem. There seems to be some mixed thinking there - one minister cutting down the rations and the other moving back the food supplies pouring in from the countryside.

You don't want a revolution to put that straight. All you want is a little more commonsense and a better organization. Then look at those slums they talk about so eloquently and so elegantly. You don't want a New World order but Mr. Wells calls for a new world order to clear them out. What you want is a pickaxe and someone to take off his coat to the job. I don't say President Roosevelt is right in all his experiments, but one does admire the spirit in which he grapples with difficulties, especially in contrast with the timidity and the mental indecision which we see, well, where shall I say - which we see in some other places. I will let it go at that.

But do you think our Parliament is strong enough to cope with the problems of the present day? You know quite well that many forces threaten our Parliamentary system. Some threaten it from politics and some from other sources. There is no doubt people do not think so much of the House of Commons as they used to. The Second Chamber is in a state of decay. I would far rather be governed by those Parliamentary institutions which have so long presided over the growth of our race and nation than by any sect or faction, or Socialist or Fascist organization or by finance and industry or by the officials of public departments or even by the newspapers. We ought to guard carefully and prudently in this age when Parliaments are everywhere being destroyed that mother of parliaments by which we have all been brought up, and not so badly brought up after all.

We hear a great deal about the reform of the House of Lords. Surely it is not only the House of Lords but all parts of parliaments that ought to be reformed to enable the parliamentary citizen of England to resist the danger of dictatorship or violent overthrow by a sect or faction of extremists on either side of politics. No one generation has the right even if they have the power, to overtuen the whole constitution and tradition of our Island. No single generation is the owner of all that has been built up here during so many centuries. We are only the trustees and life tenants, owing much to the Parliament and hoping to derive from it in the future as we have done so far.

These enormous political landslides which occur, now one wave and now another, after some stump election campaign, are harmful to our trade and livelihood. The people ought to be able to turn out a Government of which they are tired without endangering the whole life and constitution of the country. There ought to be some very much stronger security against violent change in the fundamental laws of our state and society. When such changes have to be made, they should be measured and careful. Everything ought not to be thrown into the melting pot just because a particular government is unpopular. It is too great a risk for any state to run and it might even land us in a great disaster. Therefore, I hold that the House of Lords should be reformed and made into an effective Second Chamber. It should be different in character from the House of Commons, and its task should be to keep the main structure of our National life beyond the danger of sudden and violent change. We need more structure in our system. John Bull should have strong bones. The House of Commons also should be strengthened and brought more effectively in touch with the active might of the people.

Now that everybody has votes, you know for yourselves many millions never take the trouble to use them and millions more have to be whipped up to go to the polls by some trap slogan or other. All views should be represented in the House of Commons and both sides should be heard on every question. If we go on lurching about every few years, now to one side of the road and now to the other, it will not be long before we find ourselves and the National lion in the ditch.

The franchise ought to be strengthened and what is called, weighted. There is no need to take away votes from anybody. We should give extra votes to the millions of men and women, heads of households and fathers of families who are bearing the real burden and responsibility of our fortunes upon their shoulders, pushing and dragging our National barrel up the hill.

I hope it will reform the House of Lords and put it in its proper place in relation to the House of Commons and I hope also it will reform the franchise of the House of Commons itself and make it a more true and permanent expression of the real forces that are alive in the Nation. We do not want a violent plunge into communism, followed by a violent plunge into socialism or into fascism; that would be the end of our free, ancient constitution and we should come down to the level of those happy countries where the ordinary people are simply the slaves of the Government and of the gang who are in the Government.

Please think this over very carefully. Consider it at your leisure because I am sure after many years of thought and experience that it may make a lot of difference to you and to your children.

I have only time to mention one other thing, but it is a big thing. Someone said to me the other day, "What does it matter to me and my mates, Mr. Churchill, whether we live in a great empire or a small country like Belgium? It may be different for the swell, but it is very much the same for the likes of us." That sounds all right but just look and see where we stand. There are forty-five million others in this crowded Island. On the whole, we are better off than any other similar community in the world. There are, therefore, about fifteen million souls who are here because we are the heart and center of a worldwide empire, because of our trade and connections throughout the globe, because of our long, gathered resources and ascendancy. If these are cut away from us, our population would be ground down not only in its standard of living but in its actual number towhat the soil of Britain would produce. It is all very well for Mr. Devalera to go back to the bogs of Ireland with his handful of people to a land full of food, but if we were to try to live by ourselves alone, there would be the most frightful crash and obliteration of life that has ever darkened human records. We should share the fate, on a far larger scale and in a much worse degree, of the city of Vienna which a few years ago was the capital of Central Europe and is now only a grizzly skeleton.

We should be like those whales which sometimes swim into our Scottish Harbor; when the tides go out and it leaves them stranded, the little urchin boys go and cut their names on their bellies. Now that you have this immense population here, maintained at this level of economic society, it is too late to go back to primitive conditions, too late to hanker after little England. We must be strong, we must be successful, a scientific, commercial empire or we shall starve. There is no halfway house for Britain between greatness and ruin. That is why I feel so anxious and so angry when I hear all these highbrow sentimentalists and feeble-minded talkers in their airy philosophical detachment about letting our Empire go or throwing away the Colonies, losing touch with Canada, Australia, New Zealand or South Africa - these young nations who stretch out their hands to us across the ocean. Little do these clever chatterboxes know, little do they dream of the miseries to which they would condemn the faithful, patriotic wage-earners of Britain. All this talk about our beating down the inheritance by which we live and to which we render faithful service into some vague International mixture, some sludgey amalgam, all these crazy appeals to disarm ourselves utterly amid an ambitious world, all these suicidal urges to cast away what our Nation has kept by virtue, all these shameful and blatant declarations that we are unwilling to defend our rights and possessions and that it is wrong even to think of doing so, all these lead only to the starvation and misery of the working classes, and to the end of that splendor of Britain which has in every generation been ready to die. Moreover, let me say there is no reason to suppose that the task is beyond our strength. Other nations,much weaker nations than ours, are not cowed by the difficulties of the time. They do not bow down before the terrors of the modern world and run off to hide in some hole. On the contrary, as Mr. Wells has told you, and here I agree with him, they are animated everywhere by the strongest spirit of nationalism. Everywhere we see them asserting their will to live and their right to rule. When from the relaxing hand of Britain, the reins of Empire fall, others will advance to assume our neglected duties to exploit our discarded treasures and to fill our place in the world. It will not be to any benevolent Utopia that your inheritance will pass but only to a rival nationalism who once they know you are weaker and solitary, will brush you from their path without even a word of apology or thanks.

The interest of the British Empire and of our Island is peace. We seek no territory, we desire no one's misfortune, we have no revenge for anyone, no old scores to repay. Our foreign policy should keep us free from war but we must pick on, once again, a strong, resolute community able to protect ourselves and guard our rights not only by moral but if need be, by physical force. We must shape our institutions so as to preserve the state from unconsidered lapses. We must make sure that our Island civilization and the wage standards of our people are not beaten down by outside pressure and that the policy we have so long observed does not perish through foreign violence or our own decay.

(The End)

Dear Mr Churchill

For the first time in history, the American correspondents from world fronts are going to have a club house in New York - a five story building where we can foregather and have as guests our ~~friends~~ fellow correspondents from all countries.

I am Chairman of the vital fund raising committee. And we are doing well. But general and building costs are high.

We have had an offer from a potential subscriber for a substantial sum (over his normal contribution) provided you would contribute one of your pictures to the good cause.

Is it too much to ask you to asmfly

1) Wish us well?

2) Contribute one of your paintings toward our building fund?

One or both would be appreciated.

Very truly yours

Dear Mr. Murrao

Winston was much interested by your proposals. He is however of an opinion that he should not take any part in sponsoring a film about himself, and upon reflection I do agree with him.

We are both grateful to you for the trouble you have taken in thinking out and suggesting such a generous contract.

Yours very sincerely

My dear Mr. Murrow,

Thank you so much for your letter and for your memorandum. I am taking them away with me to Italy next Monday and will show them to Winston then. He has to make two very important public speeches before we go, so I feel I cannot get his undivided attention until they are over.

I wonder when you and Janet are coming to England. I shall be away until about August 25th, when I will be coming back to England as my daughter, Mary, is expecting a baby then. Please do let me know when you are coming.

Yours very sincerely,

Dear Skipper:

I have I know been a miserable correspondent, but you would forgive me if you knew the weight of the schedule I have been carrying. It involves five 15-minute programs a week, including hard news and a so-called analysis, and then a full hour review of the week's news on Friday nights from 9 to 10.

The whole MacArthur incident has been quite fantastic. I thought that in '40 and '41 when I was a "warmonger" from London I had received some vicious and abusive mail, but I have never seen anything like the last month. All reason seems to have disappeared and listeners regard one either as a genius or a traitor. As of right now the climate seems to be cooling down a bit, both Marshall and Bradley have been excellent witnesses and when the whole thing is over we shall find ourselves exactly where we were.

I have shipped off to you a few books including Bradley's; the publication date of his over here, incidentally, is June 18. For my own part, I regard it as the best Command book to come out of the last war.

I had hoped to be seeing you at the end of this week but have just come from a session with the doctors who tell me that I cannot fly for atleast several weeks. I seem to have had a severe head cold and infection and they are afraid that it will cause damage to the ears if I fly now so the trip to Yugoslavia by way of London has been postponed. I'm afraid I'll not be seeing you before some time in July or August.

Casey is flourishing, and he and Janet will be moving to the country in the course of the next couple of weeks. I am hoping to get two months off the air this summer, probably July and August, and sometime during that period I shall without doubt be in London.

I would suggest to you that one of the real reasons for the MacArthur hysteria hasn't anything to do with MacArthur's reputation or proposals. It was rather an outburst of public resentment that had been building up for a long time; it is a reflection of a sense of frustration as a result of finding ourselves in a position where we can find no solution that is either easy or quick; it is a reflection of the irritation at small petty thieves in and around the administration, and, probably above everything else, it is a reflection of the fact that there are only two men in this country who can now communicate with the people effectively. One is Eisenhower and the other is MacArthur. Acheson cannot avoid letting his intellect show, Truman can't read, and George Marshall delivers his utterances in a dull monotone.

I remember several occasions during the war when we used to say that the time would come when we would look back on those times and refer to them as the "good old days". In that prophesy, at least, we were correct.

I shall continue to send you books from time to time and if there are any special volumns that you would like, please command me. I send you my best salute and all the affection of which I am capable.

Like always,

Mr. R.T. Clark

My dear Ed.,

In this dreary world the mere rumour that you may be coming here does one's heart good and if it turned out to be true would even make it happy. I hope the rumour is true.

I am so sorry that I have been so long in writing you though I am sure you are so busy that you haven't missed it. I wrote to Janet explaining why I have been so long so I needn't repeat the sad story except to say that we shall be "a new furnished flat on April 1 for six months as Jo is still not fit to undertake a genuine "flitting" and the establishment of our own furniture in an unfurnished one. In any case it gives us a breathing space for, if there are so signs of imminent war by September, I don't think we shall have it this year

None the less I am pretty sure we shall have alarms and excursions and we have never been less able to face them. I have every sympathy with Attlee and don't doubt that he sincrely believes that it is better to go on than let Churchill in and also that, if he holds on for the full term, things "are bound to get better" That is dubious but it is quite clear that if he went to the country now he would be beaten by about 60 Now that he has decided there is no relief for us unless more Labour boys fall sick than do Tories or the Government loses six byelections at a run The Tories might well think in terms of bumping off six Labour boys with a majority last time of under 1000!!

But it means a situation of perfect unreality and with the pressure of rearmament and the failure of nationalised enterprises to pay their way there is a slow anger invading people. They are slowly realising that when the Transport Corporation is £23,000,000 in the red and the Festival looks like loosing more than it took to build, it is their money that is being wasted and not mysterious government funds. This is all to the good It was high time that the ordinary citizen realised that cheap food is paid for by high taxation which he pays and that prices are rising because of mis-expenditure. The economists tell him nothing but he looks at his own budget and dining table and realises that the "bad old days" are a myth. He will realise it more when the budget comes for, whatever burdens may be put on the middle class and whatever reliefs are put on the worker, the former won't be enough and the latter will come out of him by indirect taxation. I don't say the ordinary man is a trained economist ; I only say he is beginning to wake up to the facts of life.

Normally that would mean an upheaval But he has nothing more to expect from the Tories and he is on the whole apathetic If the Tories win the next election the cause will not be a turnover of votes so much as Labour abstentionism. Because of their narrow majority the government fears to tackle anything since firm handling would mean a split. For the split not yet having appeared they have more to thank Tory tactics than anything the Government have done themselves. In fact we are just in a position when democracy is held to have failed and it is a measure both of apathy and of commonsense that the extreme parties have completely failed to profit from it.

It is because of this apathy that we have not yet had the witch hunts you have had. I had a letter from the Univ. of California from my adopted nephew in agony over the oath administered to teachers there. He refused to sign the university oath but did sign the State one and feels very guilty yet does not see how he could refuse the latter. I see from the N.Y. Times that you have had similar experiences in C.B.S. I never can see the point of such oaths ; no "crypto" would have any hesitation in signing and the only people likely to refuse are precisely the people they ought to cherish. But there is no limit to man's follies. It must be becoming very trying for you and I do sympathise with you but "time and the hour" you know.....

I am very sorry indeed that Herbert took the F.O. I thought he would have had more sense for in our time there is no case of a Foreign secretary becoming P.M. and I thought it was just one of those cases when his Cockney bravado wins over Scots caution I am told though that he did hesitate and only took it on Attlee's and Bevin's pressure He may tell you more himself for I gather he wants to go to the U.S. soon. I don't think he will be a success. For one thing he is out to make "a bid for peace" and that may lead him into queer paths. For another he isn't temperamentally suited to this sort of argument and he knows practically nothing of the background and the facts. How hazy we are on the "facts" here a casual perusal of the NEW STATESMAN will tell you

Also he dare not go against the Labour Left which is reviving the old nonsense of a "third force" and "restraint of the U.S." and believing, in some cases sincerely, that on the one hand armaments provoke an opponent and on the other deter him and refuse to admit that when you arm it is not a desire for peace that counts but appreciation by the other side that you are determined to fight. There is so far no will behind the armament programme because neither side dare put it there and it is in that light that you must view our whole rearmament programme. Don't mistake me If there is aggression that touches it this country will fight just as it always has. But so far it doesn't believe in the probability of such aggression and sees no vital national reason for rearmament or rather is so occupied in making ends meet that it has no time to look for one.

That was why I wanted Patrick Gordon Walker at the F.O. He is young enough to endure a reverse and Herbert isn't. And he is the only Cabinet minister who understands the historic process and is courageous enough to follow its guidance. He stood well up to Malan and got public tribute for doing so but it isn't generally known that he is the only minister who isn't taken in by that warped Harrovian Nehru and who would take a strong line in Asia. I have to depend for nearly all my information now on Foreign affairs from the N.Y. Times - my gratitide to your Govt. for giving me a free copy of the international edition is profound for I couldn't do my work without it. So far I see little sign that opinion understands what is happening and that Russia is out to organise Asia She may destroy herself in the process in so far as she is still European but we are back at the old conflict. Asia never since the beginning has known anything but the corruption of tyrannous rule and is uncomfortable under anything else though she likes exchanging one tyrant for another. But to hope democratic rule now is hopeless. Money poured in will either stick to sweaty fingers or be used against us andthere is no method of intensifying food production or industrialisation that will solve the problem of an increase in population now that science and sympathy has renoved the natural checks on it. Asia must increasingly starve unless her population is reduced ; but war would cure it as it has so often done in the past. There is a thought for you that if we leave Asia severely alone without a scrap of help corruption tyranny and Russia would solve the problem. The misery would be very great but not greater than what the present development will bring

I suppose we shall appease in Korea and the Russians will try something else somewhere else. My only hope is that we shall not be allowed to appease

I mustn't run on any more. Tell me if there is anything I can do for you especially something that doesn't earn a fee although I was most grateful for the cheque for a very miscellaneous collection of facts on the Stone They know now who did it but not where it is and are hesitating to prosecute ; in these dull days there is too much sneaking admiration for any one who looks like Robin Hood

Jules is better but is rather low for the sort of job he wants seems to elude him. Michael is in television news and is a new man. I rarely see anyone else. Add this to your collection of announcers' bloomers On the Stone the news typed "taken from Scone by Edward Ist" and Lionel Marson dear fellow read it as "Edward ist (pronounced as is German ich bin, du bist, er ist)

All the best to you Drop me even a card to say you are O.K. Hearing from Hallam St. isn't enough Better still come soon ; I8m longing for a long talk and we can sit in the dignity of the Reform Club and have it ; the alcoholic resources are excellent there.

God bless you and remember what I often told you and which I have so constantly to tell myself - "a stoot hert to a stye brae"

As always

My dear Ed., I muddled the articles so you will not receive two under separate cover but three; the Boer War one is thrown in for good measure.

Also a little par I wrote about Harold. The news was a good shock tho', the last time I saw him I thought he looked terribly ill. He just worked himself to death & the election pulling off a American trip to do so. It is a good loss not as a person than as a political scientist. I can think of so many who could have more easily spared even if I feel the best work was behind him & that caught as I was in the politics he could not have gone back to the life the best writing needs. It disturbs me and I my contemporaries as ever my -this slaughter junior. Harold was five years younger than me.

No news naturally except that as another M.P (age 4 J.!!) has died the Govt's overall majority is down to 3.

I'm now trying 8 pad at Stk. The Atlantic military boys have done besides being optimistic to pessimism.

All the best to Janet, Cassy & you

As ever

Kindest of Men

By the death of Professor Harold Laski the Labour movement has been deprived not so much of its greatest as of its only first-rate political theorist. The word "movement" is used advisedly, for the Party hierarchy often resented Laski as much as the rank and file admired him, and it is the "movement" that will feel his loss most. Economists it has by the dozen but it has never been so rich in political scientists. Laski was an accomplished scholar, with a prodigious output, yet his influence was far more personal than academic. Much learning had neither crippled his imagination nor tamed his emotions, and it was when the former was in full course and the latter frankly unleashed that he was most impressive. Formally he was a Marxist and made at least one historic attempt to show that the present Labour Party were the true heirs of Marxism; actually he derived much more from the English Radicals, some of whom were more intemperate than Marx or Stalin, and from the age-long tradition of oppression under which the race to which he was proud to belong had suffered. If his humanism was at times dubious, he was the most human of political theorists. That quality made him the keeper of the Party's conscience, a role which was usually of greater discomfort to the Party than to himself; it made him enemies but it won him friends, and it is they who will mourn him most deeply. They will be remembering one who, in an age when kindness is reckoned as a lesser virtue, was the kindest of men.

FRENCH SECURITY AND WESTERN UNION

Danger of Dilemma over Germany

FROM OUR DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENT : LONDON, Sunday.

That the Presidential visit has been a great popular affirmation of the Anglo-French alliance is admitted by everyone, even by those who exaggerate the Londoner's passion for an "occasion," irrespective of what the occasion is.

M. Auriol's reception can be explained only by the instinctive reaction of the popular mind to the necessity of the close union between Britain and France as both look out on a very uncertain future; there is nothing else to supply the kernel of a league of the European democracies in defence of their own independence. How far that instinctive feeling is translated into political action is another matter.

Urgency of Need

Towards action an immense amount of work—and not all of it paper work—has already been done, and many obstacles cleared away. But its results are not very visible and "progress" is greeted with obvious scepticism by the many forces whose interest it is that the effort at unity should fail. Nor are all the people clear on how drastic is the need for unity, and without clarity on that point there is little hope that the sacrifices which are necessary will be made. It is through failure to recognise this urgency that independence of policy carried to the extent of independence of reality can be as dangerous as failure to rearm, and can of itself make rearmament fruitless.

The Atlantic democracies cannot go on pursuing dependent and independent policies at the same time. They cannot create organs of unity and maintain policies of disunity if they want to survive the clash that is coming.

The clash need not be war. The Atlantic nations can pursue their independence until they create a state of things in which they will not be able to resist and will fall singly into enemy hands by one of the dozen means other than war. Russia herself does not want war for the simple reason that she does not believe she will need to wage aggressive war to obtain her ends. Either the hostile democracies will commit political suicide or they will be driven to make aggressive war in which, for the simple reason that such a war could have no popular basis, they would be defeated.

Mr Molotov's electoral speech is eloquent of Russian hopes. Peace to him consists in the alliance between Russia and like-minded nations, the alliance of Russia and the new China being cited as an example—that is, in a state of things in which the nations individually are brought into the Russian orbit by the approved methods.

Not Deceived

Moscow is not to be deceived by an appearance of unity. Only the real thing will bring matters for her to the test of yielding or fighting. Russia believes that there can never be the reality of unity, but at the same time there lurks the fear of what may really be behind appearance. The London celebrations have been called a manifestation of imperialism, and there is an uneasy sense that the popular demonstrations so easy to decry may reflect a political something which, though imperfect, has begun to put on solidity.

Even more than ourselves, Moscow would like to know the full purport of Mr Bevin's talks with M. Robert Schuman. Probably we should both be disappointed if we knew for, on the whole, they must have been largely procedural. They were, in fact, an exchange of views on problems connected with the forthcoming meeting of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg, the Atlantic Defence Ministers' meeting at The Hague, and the meeting of the Atlantic Council, all of which are to be held within the next four weeks, and at some time, either between the two last meetings or immediately upon the last one, there will be a formal meeting of the U.S., French, and British Foreign Ministers.

It is the Ministers' meeting that is the important one, for on it depends the success or failure of all the others. The pity is that it comes so late. It was therefore useful that Mr Bevin and M. Schuman at least should know each other's minds on the subjects to be under discussion.

The South-East Asian question is largely solving itself. Mr Nehru, gauging India's internal weakness more shrewdly than do some of his friends here, has declined to join in a "Pacific Pact" to which he knows India has no contribution to make.

France will no doubt continue to support her new "dominions," but there must come a time when she will be faced with the position that it is France in Europe that counts, and adjust her policies accordingly.

For her Annam may be a prestige matter, though after the collapse of 1940 it is difficult to see what prestige remains to be salved. Germany is a very different matter. Here it is not prestige but survival that has been at stake and may well be at stake again. What progress was made, less towards reconciling French and British policy than to obtaining a policy, is not known.

Past and Present

France is torn between tradition and appreciation of the present. Her tradition encourages her to seek a weak, divided Germany; the present situation makes a weak Germany a menace no less great than a strong one ever was. Russia has proclaimed her end, a united Germany in alliance with the Soviet Union; the only answer is a united Germany within Western Union.

A defeated nation, as Stresemann saw, becomes inevitably an object of policy. He himself at a dangerous period invented the "as if" policy—that Germany must negotiate "as if" she were a great Power, and would become one again if the bluff succeeded, as indeed she did. The Bonn Government naturally are working on similar lines, but they do not possess the resources on which Stresemann could rely.

France is too much inclined to take bluff at its face value and neglect the reality that Germany at the moment, still possessed of a powerful potential, is a desirable possession to the enemy, and that what is necessary is the stiffening of the German morale to resist Communist pressure without giving any German Government the chance to use strengthening morale against the West.

German Policy

Before Germany recovers her strength, a political position must be created which prevents her playing her old "East or West" policy. In the divided world, it would be dangerous, perhaps fatal, to let her recover strength except after genuine integration with the West. Both Mr Bevin and M. Schuman see that and, if Mr Bevin had any reproach to make about the Saar agreement, it was that they might impede that integration.

How far a formula was found which can be submitted as an Anglo-French one at the coming meeting in Strasbourg is not known, but it is very certain that one must be found. This country admits the superior interests of French security, but it cannot but emphasise once again the terms on which alone security can now be obtained, and they resolve themselves into the very simple question:—Will the strength of Germany be the bulwark of French security on the Rhine or will it be the spearhead of the Eurasian invasion?

Germany herself still hesitates to give an answer. It is for the West to supply her with the materials for the right reply, and the supreme material is evidence that the West is itself truly integrated.

How far Mr Bevin and M. Schuman succeeded in agreeing on a method of implementing the original Strasbourg intentions depends on how far they have agreed on the sacrifice of independence their countries must make. The tragedy is that we do not know if either has made up his mind about the extent of the sacrifice needed or on the necessity of pushing it through the mass of conflicting opinion and prejudices.

The test of any policy now is the degree to which it makes Western Union effective. To how much of British policy, foreign and domestic, has that test been applied?

EUROPE MUST PUT "TEETH" IN PACT

Danger of Squabble Between Britain and France

20-3.

"TEMPTATION" TO RUSSIANS

FROM OUR DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENT : LONDON, Sunday.

The international position is gradually crystallising into something like intelligibility—with more logic on the other side of the Iron Curtain than on this—and the debate on defence in the House of Commons is clear proof that the real nature of the cold war is now realised and also that Russia has the initiative if the cold war becomes a shooting war.

This is the situation that will confront the representatives of Western Union and Atlantic defence at their forthcoming meetings and there is no excuse now for not fairly facing it.

We must not only confess to, but take steps to meet, a situation in which Russia is in a greater state of readiness than are the Western Powers. For immediate action she has already deployed forces greater than anything corresponding to the forces which we have ready to use.

That is not to say that immediate action is contemplated. A good deal has been written lately of the existence of two parties in the Kremlin—a war party and a peace party. The distinction is quite meaningless. There is no difference in the Politburo except one of tactics.

The "old gang," matured in civil strife and not ignorant of the fact that it was thanks to an alliance that Russia was saved from Hitler, prefer the Stalin method of letting the enemy beat himself and taking in peace advantage of whatever mistakes are made: have not the Western Powers lost most of Asia without a Russian life being lost?

Ready to Strike

The younger men, proud of the war victory and minimising the advantages of alliance, would prefer a more active policy and the balance of opinion is visible in the fact that Russia is ready to strike but has not done so.

There is at the moment no reason to believe that the balance has been upset in favour of a forward policy, but it is evident that preparations have been made should it be deemed advisable to change policy.

That is to say, Russia will make no obviously "aggressive" move, but she will stand ready to take advantage of any weakness that may appear in the defensive apparatus of the West.

The cynic may say that in that apparatus there is nothing but weakness and that no more propitious moment could be found than now when the West has not only no striking force but no defence force capable of resisting a blitzkrieg.

Russia Would Lose

This may be true, but it is also still true that a blitzkrieg, however successful, does not necessarily win a war, and that, as in Hitler's case, the resources of the West are such and are so distributed that a blitzkrieg could not render them useless. There would be a long war, and whoever won it is certain that Russia would lose.

Much more significant is the fact that Russia has deployed her available strength in such a way that she can act—or react—anywhere. Nothing comparable has been done nor can b edone in peacetime by the West. Nothing that is likely to be realisable in the near future can be done to prevent any occurrence like the overrunning of Poland in 1939, an occurrence in which, if we are allowed the privilege, we shall for the most part be spectators

Problem for Ministers

The point that the Defence Ministers, and still more the Foreign Ministers, have to decide is at what point "somewhere" shall be substituted for "anywhere." It cannot be a defensive point like the Maginot Line. It must be a point at which we can not only defend that "somewhere" but come out of it to take the offensive in our turn.

Politically and strategically we have to apply the old principle of concentration of all forces on the decisive field. This is such a truism that it seems unnecessary to refer to it. Unfortunately, history shows that it is still being neglected.

Instead of waging the cold war with a plan, we have hitherto merely reacted to Russian provocation. On the broadest lines we defend now Europe, now Asia, now both at once, with what we have available, which must always be inferior to what the Russians have available.

Defenceof S.E. Asia

That is in part due to the geography of the Atlantic alliance which, if in its narrow form is concerned solely with the defence of Atlantic Europe, has to cast its eyes constnatly to the Pacific, where the U.S. has a West Coast and an outpost line and Britain and France have "dominions."

The defence of South-East Asia may be viewed as the defence of the approaches to inner lines of defence. That defence cannot be military except in the completely impossible circumstances of Europe's being in all senses safe from attack.

It remains then to be seen if it can be condu[illegible] otherwise. Mr P. C. Spender, of [illegible]ralia, says it can be, France says it ought to be, and Mr Dean Acheson and [illegible]st Bevin bless the former and [illegible] console the other against the [illegible] being wrong.

[illegible] advocated is to hurl in [illegible] and economic help. The reason [illegible] that South-East Asia is inhabited [illegible] majority of people who are underfed. [illegible]illised and downtrodden, and that this mass is a breeding-ground of Communism. Raise the standard of living and you rout Communism automatically.

Dubious Argument

The argument is more than dubious. It is not until Jeshurun waxes fat that he kicks, and it is not proved by history that poverty-ridden masses are capable of political action.

All the countries of South-East Asia are rich enough to supply the modest needs of the mass of the population which suffers not so much from maldistribution of natural resources as from corrupt and contemptible government which has never been so uncorrupt as to tackle the burden of debt.

To provide economic aid without control from outside would be merely adding to the corruption by supplying corrupt governments with resources which they refuse to find for themselves. Government is an art that takes long to learn—we have been at it for a thousand years and, according to informed critics, have been less successful than we might have hoped to be.

Impossible Task

The countries we are asked to help have have been at it only for decades, some only for a few years. They will not let the West supply government and as a result anything material the West does supply stands the best of chances of being wasted.

The supply is not altruistic but selfish. it is part of Western defence, not a new departure for Asia. If that is so the West, with ever increasing demands on its resources nearer home, is faced with an impossible task.

If it is to put the West in a state of defence that is real, it must draw in its horns financially somewhere. The amount to be distributed is limited. Its distribution must, therefore, be governed by the principle, first things first, and the first thing is Europe.

It is one of the extraordinary things of the time that a Europe, from whose capitals the dangers are distant only a matter of very few hundreds of miles, should now be squabbling as are France and Britain about their share of its defence expenses while their Governments cheerfully consider the expenditure of millions on far away places which can be defended only in Europe.

Source of Exhaustion

In a Global war the importance of Asia is that it is an continent in which a world Power can extend iteslf dangerously as Japan did. With victory in Europe there was nothing for the then Asiatic conqueror but surrender or suicide. There comes a point—in war, of course—at which conquest in Asia becomes a source not of strength but exhauston.

The point is reached more quickly if actually the decisive action is being fought in Europe. The truth is that if Europe holds, Asia can be recovered; if Europe fails to hold, Asia and everything else is lost.

We are always asked to take a global view and so we should. But taking a global view does not mean that we take the view that every point in the globe is of equal value. In the quarrel between continental and peripheral strength every stage so far has been decided in favour of the peripheral power.

To the Atlantic alliance, which has either to go on perfecting itself or collapse, Western Europe is peripheral. It is no longer continental as it used to be. That is what global war means. It is of no help to the Defence Ministers if, when they meet to discuss European defence, they are left in doubt on the sertngth on which they can reckon in men, guns, and money and are not assured that there will not be diversions.

Practical Aim

That assurance must come from the politicians, who must make up their minds what is the practical aim of their policy. We have it defined as the creation of a dyke against Communism. If that is so, it becomes a question whether it is better to have a sound dyke at one point, with the hope of gradual extension, or everywhere a makeshift thing permeable anywhere.

Until that is settled it is idle to ask the Defence Ministers to prepare adequate defences in Europe, and it makes the present squabble between France and Britain not only dangerous but silly, for they quarrel now over an expenditure whose extent nobody has fixed, because nobody has any idea of limiting our commitments but is content to let the Russians enlarge them at will.

There are other causes for Atlantic disunion than the inability of the politicians to make up their minds, but it is the most potent cause of het disunity since, without priorities being definitely settled, each nation can insist on its own peculiar priority of the moment, whether that priority is external or internal.

They have not much time for making up their minds for their present uncertainty and the consequent failure to have given the Atlantic Pact adequate teeth, are increasing temptations to the forward school in Moscow.

If the present indefensibility of Europe continues the temptation might prove too great for Mr Stalin himself.

NEED FOR UNITY IN THE WEST

Strasbourg Meeting Under Shadow of Aggression

COST OF DEFENDING LIBERTY

FROM OUR DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENT : SUNDAY NIGHT.

It is now learned that Mr Dean Acheson, U.S. Secretary of State, will not be coming to Europe until May. The controversy, therefore, whether he should come before or after the many diplomatic meetings of the coming weeks is now settled. He will come at the end of them, or as nearly the end as makes no matter.

There are some observers who would have preferred him to come earlier and confront some of the meetings at any rate with reproaches for the slowness with which "integration" is being pursued. Others feel that it was right to give Europe a sort of last chance and present him—and so the United States—with some real accomplishment. Both views are arguable, but argument is now superfluous. It remains to be seen how Europe will react to a challenge.

The United States is no better served by her agents than is Britain or France, but what they serve up in the way of information gets much more publicity. The result is that a combination of officialdom and the ordinary channels of publicity have made the average American who is interested in politics much more aware of the truths of the situation than his European counterpart.

If it is true that, being far away from the battlefield, he is more easily scared, it is also true that he has grasped the essentials more quickly. This has nothing to do with the Committee Investigating Un-American Activities, who themselves are something that can be described as un-American, nor with the fact that the possession and use of the atomic bomb creates what is known as a guilt complex which in the Americans' actual inexperience of bombing creates a fear complex rather akin to what this country experienced in 1938, a complex which was largely confined to the "intellectual" and easy-circumstanced classes.

Less Frankness

But even if some of the results have been unpleasant—so distinguished a scientist as Dr Bush felt compelled to write a book to seek to dissipate some of the results of fear—the fact remains that the classes which in the main create opinion as a force are more publicly aware of the dangers in Russian war preparations than are people here.

There has been much less frankness here. It is not that the similar classes here are any less aware of the dangers, but there is a reluctance to publicise them. The reluctance is partly due to electoral consideration. No democratic party feel that "guns or butter" is a good slogan, and it is worth noting that with the exception of Mr Churchill's departure from the official brief there was a tacit agreement not to discuss the foreign situation as an electoral issue. So far as the recent election campaign was concerned, it would never have been suspected that any one was aware that London is within 400 miles flying distance of fully-equipped Russian air bases.

Equally, there is among these classes a considerable element who, for reasons of their own, do not wish the "Russian menace" to be discussed for the very simple reason that either as "fellow travellers" or as men interested more in other things they intend to ignore it. Thus, although Ministers are well aware of the position they do not propose to take a public and united attitude upon it. By concealing any need for urgency in organising Europe for defence, they have created an impression that there exists no such need and that many of the present difficulties in getting that organisation can be left to time quietly to remove.

No doubt time would remove them if the passage of time meant a gradual revelation of the seriousness of the position and if we are allowed time. The trouble is that time may not be given us for the revelation of the need to produce action in time, perhaps not even enough to allow agreement between the Western European States to be reached by a slow evolutionary process. There is no public pressure on the Government here because the public are not informed. The Government will not act until there is pressure, and so the vicious circle is maintained.

First Line

In the minds of American statesmen who, after all, are very rightly looking to the safety of their own country, Europe is the U.S.A.'s first line of defence. If Europe goes, then the barbarian is at the American gates.

To enable Europe to fulfil that role—it should be said at once that there was no intention of letting her do so without physical U.S. help, Americans as well as Europeans would battle on that line—the U.S. sought two methods (1) to put Europe economically on her feet again, for a bankrupt nation cannot fight a war; and (2) to rearm her. To achieve both there must be a Europe transcending the individual States. There could be no neutrals and no hangers-back. With traitors there could be other and sharper dealings.

There exists a network of treaties and a Western European organisation, but there is still no Europe, and inside that organisation there is a conflict of policies and a refusal to end "isolations" as if there were no danger at all and the question were purely technical. It cannot be too strongly emphasised that the urge to European unity is not primarily a natural one in a comprehended evolution, but a deliberately constructed one anticipatory of any such evolution because there is no other way of salvation given the present distribution of world strength.

Britain has not yet made up her mind to submit decisions on policy to an overruling authority. Nor does she see any necessity, for, as it has been cynically put, "there would appear to be no reason for haste since war will automatically create that authority." In other words, we can neglect taking measures in peacetime which we shall be unable to avoid in war. If war comes we shall have these measures. If war does not come there is no overriding need for them.

Missing Example

There is no reason indeed to single out Britain in particular. The failure of all other Western countries to do better is patent. But historically we like to think that we save Europe by our example and in this crisis example has not been forthcoming, largely because we do not place things in the proper order of precedence.

National defence takes precedence always, and that precedence is always admitted when the need for defence is made plain to the people, and even to the least imaginative of Ministers the continued existence of the welfare State as a State is an essential condition to the spreading of welfare. Defence in its working out may be a military, though it can never be wholly a military, task. Its basis is a political decision. Strategics alwaye wait on politics as is fitting, but economics do not wait on politics, which is not fitting, and in the theory that a trade or a financial policy can be conducted independently of a defence policy lies much of the trouble in Western Europe.

The decision to create political unity in whatever form may be decided is completely ineffective unless the whole of the policy is conducted within the framework of that decision, and the fundamental fault of the Western European organisation is that it is designed so as to allow national policy freedom in far too many spheres. If the consultative Assembly represent Europe, the Ministerial Committee, the powerful body, represent only Governments, and not just Governments but even the independence of Government Departments.

It is of little use Continental politicians complaining of British "isolation." The simple fact that there is an English Channel emphasises by a geographical fact geographical isolation, but where political "isolation" is concerned no Western nation is much less guilty.

Vague Proposals

When the Ministerial Committee meet this week in Strasbourg they will have before them various proposals for ending "isolation" and particularly British "isolation." There will be proposals for strengthening the Assembly and for the transformation of the Council from being a gathering of over-busy Foreign Ministers to becoming a gathering of special Ministers who will in fact in their respective Cabinets be Ministers for Europe.

The scope of these proposals remains vague and there is at least a suspicion that the emphasis on Britain implies a desire to make Britain, because of her geographical isolation, the corpus vile for experiments to end isolation. But no experiment and no reform will avail anything until the Ministerial Committee can bring to bear a genuine pressure on the domestic politics of each country.

How that is to be done without an abnegation which is essentially foreign to the politician's make-up has not yet been determined, nor is it likely to be determined this week. But the need for such a development could be made public with reference to the situation that actually confronts the West. It is at the moment militarily indefensible against a sudden aggression skilfully planned. It is nearly as indefensible politically because there is no unity in appreciation of the danger.

It is not defeatism to say that the first task of the Strasbourg meeting is less to get unity and end "isolation" than publicly to proclaim and prove the need for getting the one and ending the other. What is being debated in Strasbourg is not an academic constitutional question in a peaceful world, but a life-and-death matter under the direct shadow of aggression in one form or another.

What the Ministry are asked to show is that the democratic process can be swift and decisive. It is good to talk of liberties and the need to defend them. It is also good to realise that liberties need to be pooled and even to be curtailed if liberty is to be defended. And it is the liberty of the West not the liberties of Government Departments that is at stake.

NATAL CAMPAIGN ENDS VICTORIOUSLY WITH RELIEF OF LADYSMITH

WHILE the British troops were celebrating the avenging of Majuba by being kind to their Boer prisoners and clearing up the debris of battle around Paardeberg, news arrived of the relief of Ladysmith. Almost at the same time the news of Cronje's surrender reached Buller's troops as they were preparing to enter the little town on which the eyes of the Empire had been fixed for 118 weary days.

The Empire duly and rightly beflagged itself. Critics on the Continent, if no less voluble, became less dangerous; there were wearier days to come, but the world in general, and the British Army in particular, felt that a turning point had been reached.

The story of the relief comes almost as an anti-climax to the desperate days of Colenso and Spion Kop. There was heavy fighting, indeed, but it lacked incident.

True, there was the adventure into the Boer lines after dark of a company of the Cameronians, and the desperate attempts to get the survivors away. Likewise the unsupported and suicidal charge of the Irish Brigade into a circle of Boer fire in a gallant effort to storm Tugela Hill, which still bears, one hopes, the proud name of Inniskilling Hill.

But it was hard, dogged pedestrian work and the last great battle cost us only some 500 casualties. Between them Roberts and Buller broke the Boer morale rather than that Buller defeated the Natal Army.

Enigmatic Buller

From one point of view the interest is psychological rather than military, and centres on the enigmatic personality of Redvers Buller, who, from his physique and record, seemed the last man of whom psychological study appeared profitable.

When he drew back from Spion Kop, without ever having put the matter genuinely to the test, no one knew what was in his mind. He blamed the unfortunate Warren, who indeed had not justified his command, but after all he was Buller's subordinate, and merely to condemn him as an insubordinate and unskilful tactician did not alter the fact that it was Buller, not he, who was in command.

On February 25 Buller told Roberts that he would "have one more try," but feared the result and actually asked Roberts for orders. Roberts told him to postpone any operation he had in mind unless he was "fairly confident of success," but White, when told of his fears, urged that the try be made; Ladysmith could hold out for six more weeks.

Actually his mind was made up, but what he had decided is still not clear. He had proved to himself that the relief by an attack on the Boer centre was impossible, and next that an attack by the extreme left was equally impossible. He now proposed to prove the same of an attack on the right of the new Boer position, east of Colenso, and, having done that, he sought to show that an attack on the extreme right was just as impossible. He found, however, that it was not only possible, but easy. Even then he found it hard to believe in success.

Boer Leaders Relax

East of Colenso the Boer right was marked by the flat hill of Vaal Krantz, on which gunfire could be brought to bear from south of the river. Buller had therefore a superb opportunity, for after the fiasco of Spion Kop, which the Boers mistook for a decisive defeat, Boer discipline relaxed, and the three leaders, including Louis Botha, went off on sick or holiday leave.

The force available to defend Vaal Krantz was only some 800 men, later raised to some 1200, but Buller did not move until February 5, and by that time the Boer command had wakened up to the fact that the attack was to be renewed and where it would be renewed. By the time Buller was ready to move off 4000 riflemen were waiting for him.

When he did move, it was with painful slowness and in full view of enemy observers. He had the river bridged by 6 a.m., but did not let the attack begin until 2 p.m. When they did move, the troops moved fast and Vaal Kranz was in our hands by 4.30. It was impossible to stay there, but Buller made no move. Instead, on March 6, he telegraphed

Roberts again that he had "pierced the enemy lines" and could go on, but that it would cost anything up to 3000 casualties to clear the flanks and let the advance continue. Should he risk it?

Roberts, who might well have been indignant at this constant attempt to saddle him with responsibility in a theatre from which he was far distant and about which he was ignorant, replied promptly that he must risk it. "Tell the troops," said the commander-in-chief as a tactful way of telling their commander, "that the honour of the Empire is in their hands."

On the 7th Buller was still undecided, while all around Vaal Krantz the Boers were being reinforced. In the afternoon he called a council of war, the last resort of generals who want to do nothing. They agreed to a withdrawal, and that night the British were all back on the south bank.

Damning Verdict

So ended what had been a promising beginning, but turned out to be, in the words of the war's historian, "one of the feeblest performances in the history of the war." Considering the variety of feeble performances this is as damning a verdict as could be given.

Once again Buller addressed himself to Roberts for orders, actually blaming his ill success on the fact that the troops he had expected had been assigned to Roberts's army for the great flank march. Roberts did not argue, but simply told him to stay on the defensive and hope for relief through a success in the far West. When Roberts said, "push on," Buller invariably threw in his hand; when Roberts said, "stay where you are," Buller felt bound to attack. Roberts cannot, therefore, have been surprised to heard that Buller was going to try again.

This time he was going to turn the Boer right, but first had to clear the enemy from the hills on that flank, south of the Tugela. Operations started on the 14th after a painful move eastwards. He left the conduct of operations to Lyttelton and the 4th Division, who proceeded in fine style to clear the South bank; Cingolo, Hlangwane, Monte Cristo, one after another were taken and only Buller's orders, "No pursuit," allowed the enemy to retreat leisurely across the river.

No one suspected that a series of well-planned operations crowned with success against Boer riflemen had begun the demoralisation that was to overtake them. They had to be rallied by Jobert in person and by a fiery Calvinistic tirade which ended thus:—"The Lord will strengthen his people in their faith; though they have no earthly rock behind which to take cover, they shall win in the open plain"; it was faith rather than cover which was failing.

Buller's Reckless Advance

On the 21st the advance across the river began—in the wrong place. Repeating all his old errors, Buller proceeded to direct troops into an open plain on the North bank, dominated everywhere except in rear by garrisoned heights In the historian's words he was "shoving troops into an amphitheatre where they were shot at from all the seats." For two days the hopeless battle went on.

Kopjes were taken only to be found untenable, so that the troops began to lose heart as each advance was followed by withdrawal, especially at the admission of defeat when Buller, on the 25th, asked for an armistice to get back the wounded; at one point there was one of those strange panics that even the best disciplined troops exhibit.

Had they but known it, their ordeal was at an end. For once Buller used his artillery to effect, and the constant strain of battle under heavy shell fire began to tell. Buller was persuaded finally of the folly of the actual line of advance, and changed it just as the Boers, badly shaken, had decided he was defeated. He brought more guns to bear, shifted the line of attack a little to the east, where, in driving the Boers from their lines, cover would be given at least in part, and renewed the attack.

Left to subordinates it was properly organised, and when it once got going the Boers lost heart. Against the gunfire they had no adequate reply and the British Army no longer offered themselves as a sitting target.

The burghers had had enough and now, despite all the entreaties their leaders could devise, they were "going home." They had heard that Cronje was cut off and no longer able to offer fight, and, although there was no chance of the manœuvre of Paardeberg being repeated in Natal, they proceeded by ones and twos and then in crowds to decamp. By the 27th they had gone from Buller's front and at the cost of 500 casualties the road to Ladysmith was opened.

Ladysmith Relieved

The troops, engaged at last in intelligible operations that were pursued with energy and a definite aim, had recovered their spirits, and the last fights were easy victories. On the 27th, finding nothing in front of him, Dundonald, with the cavalry on the right, rode unmolested into Ladysmith, to be greeted by soldier and civilian alike as the symbol less of liberation than of victory.

The rot set in even among the besiegers of Ladysmith. They left their lines and saw no safety save in taking up a defensive position in the Biggarsberg, well away from Ladysmith, and sending some of their commandos to stave off the British advance to Bloemfontein. The news of Cronje's surrender completed a debacle that had already started.

Much could have been done to harry the retreat and the indomitable White sent out a lean-half-fed column to do so, but, true to himself, Buller's first command to him was an order of recall. He was fulfilling his mission to relieve Ladysmith; the higher mission to turn retreat into rout was forgotten. On March 1 he joined White in Ladysmith, and thereafter, instead of thinking how to exploit his victory, he busied himself solely with the formal entry into the town—which he made on March 3.

He had done what he set out to do, although no one has ever accomplished a military task with such neglect of all the teachings of war. But he had done it, and the country and Empire were duly grateful. Even the troops whose loyalty had been sorely shaken recognised victory when they saw it, and ascribed it with no justice at all to their leader.

The Natal campaign from the day on which Penn Symons flung himself at Talana Hill was a long series of blunders and weaknesses, but despite these victory was won in the end, and the world saw it as such. As February faded into March, Buller, White, and Roberts were the Empire's heroes. Criticism and appraisement were only to come later.

My dear Ed.,

Under separate cover I'm sending you my stuff for the 13th and the 20th which a variety of reasons have delayed but I'm trying to arrange having you sent from Glasgow the Mondays papers by air Dealing with merely a City office sometimes copies are delayed or they get the wrong edition. In the paper of the 13th I left in the Boer War article ; it is strange to think how I fought those battles at Wycombe school fifty years ago."

There is very little news here. The Govt. has settled down survived its first victories and I see no reason why Attlee need accept defeat until he wants. The instructions have gone out to be ready in October and I rather fancy that will be the date unless the balloon goes up. So far as can be seen at the moment there will be little difference in the figures I should say that Labour would regain more seats than they would loose new ones but that means nothing.

The nuisance is that we are now discussing everything but what matters the defence situation. I hope that the U.S. representatives will talk straight when they start here on April 1. We have in the West an imposing lot of committees and nothing else ; it is eloquent of the situation that we are now trying to get some agreement and co-operation before the Atlantic Committee meets. Actually I question if the West could put into the field thirty divisions all told or do that within a month. There is still no decision on strategy except that the "West" (undefined) has got to be defended. Now no one says and there is no Maginot line anywhere even to sit behind There are two plans - one to wait till the Russians get to the Rhine and do a Rommel on them ; the other is to break them up before they get to the Rhine Both have their points but they need troops and the troops aren't there What I think is needed is for the joint chiefs of staff to appoint a commander and a Cossac to decide on the correct strategy, defence or attack and let the plans be worked out. One thing I'm sure of - if the Russians get to Paris there won't be another Normandy for a very long time I still think that the Russians may have a go if they once think defence is being taken in earnest, possibly either by attacking Tito or staging a "revolution" in Italy There is a feel of something pending in the air that is too reminiscent of 1938-9

Otherwise nix. No scandals so far and no revelations May have more for you next week. Meantime our joint love to the three of you. In haste

As always

My dear Ed.,

This is as much to Janet as to you for it is a thank you first for two resplendent bottles of whisky so resplendent that it will be a serious trial to cease from gazing at them and to open them, and for a very lovely parcel. Have you ever had to take cocoa for breakfast ? If you haven't you have no idea what it means to have a reserve of tea and when the complement of real cane sugar is added it is as near the conception of Paradise as stricken Europe can imagine! Our most grateful thanks to you both. Yesterday was New Year's day ; may 1950 bring all three of you much happiness and all that you wish for yourselves - well perhaps not all that Casey could wish but as much of that as is good for him.

The celebrations were, to judge from the noise that persisted up to a late hour, were as enthusiastic as ever but I can't think that except for the paid optimists of the Labour Party any one looks forward to the new year with much cheer. There are more clouds than ever on the horizon.

This for you particularly I think the date of the election is fixed now - third week in February But it isn't absolutely certain and I don't know when the decision will be announced. It must come in the next fourteen days if it is to be as early as that. But there is still a body of opinion in the Labour party that wants it late rather then early. Electorally they think the weather has its effects the forecasts for February aren't good while in June good weather could be expected and a big Labour poll. Also there is the budget to think of and opinions there aren't unanimous. But by and large I think February will carry the day, though I am willing to admit I could be quite mistaken.

otherwise there is little doing. We await Colombo and wonder if before it meets the U.S. will have taken a decision. I am presuming there is more in the advocacy of the defence of Formosa than just only election tactics. Actually there is a lot to be said for it for if a "resistance" can be maintained the U.S. could veto any change in the Chinese delgation to the U.N. I hear Nehru made a great impression in Washington ; for the sake of the reputation of the State department I hope not. Politically he is a crook and I wouldn't trust him an inch not even to take adequate measures for his own survival which is always dountful and the folly of his Pakistan policy is flagrant. What is the use of stopping the Russians on the Mekong if you let them through the Khyber ? Well/well! There it is and I almost believe there is likely to be employment for a military corr. yet.

Enough just now. If I hear anything definite before it is public on dates I'll get a wire to you.

Meantime ever so many thanks to you both for your kindness from us two and the best of wishes to the three of you for 1950

Looking forward so much to seeing you

As ever R.T. Clark

My dear Ed.,

Somewhere on the high seas there is a tiny book on its way to you as an Xmas remembrance I hope it may amuse you and Janet in an odd moment ; it may also recall the author to you in blitz nights at the Dorchester but don't let that interfere with your reading of it

I have been most remiss in writing to you although I think I did get one short letter away to you but times have been sticky one way or another. I had about a fortnight of flu not due to malnutrition but from having to hang about in the wet looking for a taxi to take my middle cat back from the vet ; he had a poisoned ear so was really in worse case than me. Then Jo went down with something pretty similar but it hit her tummy and still troubles her, but I shan't weary you with relations of woe for actually there isn't really much woe. Things all happened at once and took too long to evaporate.

I am adding a short note on the situation as I see it here Whether or not it will edify you is dubious but it is sent with that object.

Of personal news there is very little I think I told you J.C.S. Macgregor had died ; otherwise theface of the B.B.C. sppears little changed. I see Michael occasionally and we never fail to mention you and say how slack we are in writing. I had lunch with the two Arthur Mann's of Mutual and the Yorkshire Post respectively to discuss the Press Commission's report. Although it was favourable I don't think Fleet Street realises the depth of the dislike of the Morrisons and the Bevans for it and how many people in its own ranks would conspire to do it down. If the press doesn't set up a committee to deal with complaints and recommend action in the case of bad lapses the Government will set up one for them and then the fat will be in the fire.

I work enough to keep the income tax collector away from the door It is always a difficulty to decide whether to do more and pay more income tax or try and do on what I do do. The Glasgow Herald keeps me in day-to-day funds and gives me sufficient to do to give me the impression that I am still working. But there isn't much hope I fear of getting down to anything solid For one thing this flat isn't such as to contain my books so that is a handicap but I am giving it another six months until I see how certain things develop Otherwise things go on as usual. I am now an insured person get a pension if I live to be sixty nine and have no other keans of livelihood ; it will just suffice to get me an ounce of tobacco a week while in the workhouse so I shan't do too badly.

I have been twice at Mallam street of late but missed Howard both times Once he was in Yugoslavia and the next time I don't know where I was most interested to meet your lad Zwimmer (??) who gave me direct news of you and your work and besides being nice seemed really intelligent. You seem to havetaken on a real bit of work which is making its mark and must do good in the long run. I hear of it sometimes from my friend Katherine Ostrander in San Diego ; your talks always seem much discussed. I was even appealed to to say whether you were right in some bit of prophecy and I duly said you were ; chalk that up on the credit side.

I am sending this to Madison Square because there seems some doubt at No. 49 whether you are still in your New York house or whether you have entirely given that up and are travelling into town daily You will I am sure be better in the country but travelling has its disadvantages ; of course your trains run to time, or I am told they do, and go smoothly enough to let a traveller write. Do they ? Ours do not. I hope Janet likes the country and is well and cheery Casey must be a big boy these days, even beginning to think in terms of school. Keep him a way from all psychiatrists, psychotherapists, psychologists, faith healers and obsequious physicians When I was a kid if we fell and cut our little knees we used to rub the cut with a dirty penny to make it septic and have the distinction of a badly swollen knee Now they bandage a scratch and stick all sorts of needles in one. I don't belive that the modern child to judge from a nearby specimen will have any proper blood left - onehalf will be vitamins and proteins and the other half vaccines. Tell me when Casey gets a taste for books and I will see he gets the proper stuff

Excuse all this but it is the festive season - God help it. The very best to you and Janet and Casey and auf wiedersehen I am thrilled at the chance of seeing you at the election ; it makes that consultation of the popular will almost worthwhile On the date see the enclosed.

R.

PS. I did say I wanted something. Our main difficulty here is that we can't get American books and American publishers even the government ones won't send review copies. If you have any influence on Government, do you think you could persuade them to send me copies of official diplomatic and military publications. I enclose a little anippet about an official history, No one here has even seen a volume and I could very easily review it and give it some publicity. Besides I'd like that history for my own purposes. But don't make any trouble about it. I will discuss this question when I see you.

NOTES ON THE SITUATION.

Home

There will be nothing of interest here until the election. The date is not announced and I doubt if it is fixed. There are some indications and I think that the possible dates are either last days of February to first days of March or early in June. The debate on which was in full swing at least in the middle of last week. There are two factors One the jubilee of the Labour party is in February and is being made an occasion ; it would fit in with pre-election propaganda and it would be well to take advantage of the party enthusiasm which it is hoped will be whipped up. The bother is the Budget Cripps and Morrison don't want another budget which would, if it came before the election, be an electoral votecatching one To really catch votes would mean a definite tax relief and if that were given, there would need to be a supplementary budget in autumn to put all the taxes on again. Economies in the matter of state expenditure aren't considered either feasible or likely to win votes. On the other hand Bevin who is by far the strongest influence on Attlee and who is facing another cave conducted by Dick Crossman, Ian Mikardo and their associates wants the late date first because it will embrass Cripps with whom he is at odds - you would notice that he kept Cripps out of the Commonwealth conference on Jan 9 and that Treasury officials are going subservient to him - and second, because he wants to attend all the Colombo conference and have a pleasant passage home by sea which takes time ; he is forbidden to go by air. A March date would suit him, but he would prefer June. The betting is fairly even - 3 to 1 for March ; 5 to 1 for June. I have not made up my mind but I think it is fifty fifty especially as there is a strong feeling that the government should have its full term Some of the boys are not coming back and they want to hold on to their salaries as long as possible

The offical Labour estimate of the result is a net majority of 80 - I should say 100 - if they go before Feb. ends ; if they wait until June anything may happen to upset calculations At the moment the biggest asset is the Tory party which is not united has no policy and no leader except Churchill and he is a foreign political crisis man The country neither knows them nor trusts them ; the middle class which could be decisive is hesitant, divided and scared while the crisis has not yet really touched the workers. The comparison with old days however you make it has ceased to count. The new voter remembers little before 1939 and stories of what things used to cost leaves him cold as he can afford the new prices. If there is a financial crisis and the worker is hit badly it is the Communists not the Tories who will reap the benefit.

Don't pay too much attention to the unofficial strikes It is true that the inspiration is Communist but they could not succeed were it not for the curious dichotomy of the working man who in an industrail dispute will go to any extreme and vote Tory at an election. The real cause of the disputes is that the machinery under nationalisation is slower more impersonal and very remote. Where an employer could deal with a disupute immediately whether he settled it or not the mere process of beginning to deal takes too long now and those who deal are unknown officials of whom there is considerable jealousy. I heard a lot at this last power station strike of the difference between Citrine of the T.U.C. and Lord Citrine of the Electricity Authority, and that as much as anything is the cause of the troubles It is a cause that the nationalisers did not foresee, and now don't know how to deal with.

There is much grumbling at high prices, lack of goods and restriction but they vary so much that united action isn't very possible ; until something hits us all simultaneously, as it might if there was a quarrel with the U.S. Labour is sitting still pretty It is impossible to tell how the Liberals will do. They have an obvious chance in the existing dissatisfaction but they have no leaders and no policy. If either a Liberal or a Tory could come out with ten points to ease every one's burdens and show how it could be done on a relatively short term scale he would sweep the country But such panaceas are not to be found.

Foreign

There is no other issue really except relations with the U.S. and I don't think Ernie is helping them. He thinks with his belly and his vanity is appalling He thinks that the Americnas don't treat him with proper deference and he is sore. The publication of differences on the terms on which military aid is given was typical There was no need for it and it only confuses. On the general situation Ernie is now completely disillusioned ; he doesn't belive any more in a deal with Russia and so has set his own left against him which still drivels about a meeting between Stalin Truman and Attlee to settle everything round the fire Nor has the Dalton wing to which we have to add Bevan who is now gunning for Ernie's succession with surprising success given up the idea of opposing a Socialist Europe to capitalist America and Communist Russia although it is now clear that only here and in Norway is there even the similtude of a Socialist government I think you will find that freedom from America will be an election slogan. They won't know what it means but it will be associated with shortage of petrol and dear tobacco and the fact that the U.S. will absorb less and less of our exports

There is no real unease about the military programme because the there is a firm conviction that Russia will not make the first move towards war. It is not seen that at the moment Russia much more than the U.S. is draining us dry by forcing Europe to spend on armaments which will not give her security as the Russians arm parallelly and can with ease cause us to disperse what strength we have. I think they will sit tight in Europe knowing that the Continent dare not move troops while three fully equipped Russian armies are on its frontier, and be active in Asia hoping to attract there the military strength of Britain and the U.S. In a long war I think the west would win but the first six months would be disasters compared to which Dunkirk was a fleabite.

There is a frantic disclaimer everywhere of intent to rearm Germany but the position is perfectly plain. We shall have to defend Western Germany if there is trouble e.g. a Communist coup ; the only question is which side will have the German divisions on their side. If we don't the Russians will and nothing the politicians say will alter that. The only matter is how can Germany be safely armed impression on pressmen here including me.

I think the trouble will come in China where the Government is all for recognition of the Reds without making recognition conditional I foresee a worsening of the situation in IndoChina, Malaya and Burma and perhaps India It is worth noting that Nehru has gone all Imperialist despite his republicanism and at Colombo Ernie is going to be faced with a united front of the Commonwealth - except perhaps Malan - to exploit the Empire and beat the dollar that way. It could be done but not by this government and that is one of the factors in an election that cannot yet be estimated

At the moment we have no foreign policy ; we have merely a collection of grievances. We can neither stand alone nor honestly unite and the relations between the Treasury and the Foreign Office, between the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office, between the Social Services and the Fighting Services poison everything. The press never refers to the big issues ; it concentrates on silly trifles and personalities and so the real issues never get discussed. We all live in a fool's paradise too proud to admit dependency, too foolish to extract profit from dependency, and optimistic in the worst sense of believing that whatever is going to happen is not going to happen to us ; the pessimists are those who have to live with the optimists. If we had just one statesman for one year but we haven't.

Dear R. T.:

I have just sent you a cable telling you that I had to scrub the plans for the album. I have become involved with too many things over here and the doctors have descended upon me with a diktat that I must take some time off this summer.

I realize that you have done some work on the project and insist that you let me compensate you for it.

I want also to return to something that I have written about before, namely; your visit to this country. Why don't you come for the U.N.Assembly in the Autumn. I will send you a ticket; you will live with us and will have no need for dollars. This is a wholly serious proposition and both Janet and I are most anxious that you should accept. Please let me hear from you as soon as possible.

As ever yours,

Easter Day

My dear Ed.,

Easter holidays have upset things and I only got this r written today I have just got your welcome letter of the 11th and I'll tell you what I have done. I have heard the album a first time and got an idea of the thing I am going to hear it again this week early. It is an excellent bit of work, though I thought the quality of some records poorer than we could do here, and the arrangement and annotations are excellent.

I have had long interviews with J.B. and Bryan George and will get all the help we need. But there are a few things I think you should know ; you probably know them already but as I got them at first hand I'll risk repetition.

1. There are two rivals in the field. H.M.V. are doing something similar with Snagge as commentator. Victor of U.S. are also doing one with Bob Trout as commentator. The latter is not coming over and is leaving selection etc to George. J.B. tells me the wires are humming between H.M.V. and Victor and it is uncertain whether there will be two, or just one with different commentators, for the national sales market. I shall try and find out the sort of selecting that is being done. I think we could avoid doubling except perhaps on one or two obvious items but the position may make you have second thoughts. Also you may be able to find out more at your end than I can here. Let me know.

2. The B.B.C records amount to about 30,000 and there is as yet no catalogue. I think I could reduce that number right away to some thousand and would aim to have the rest available when you come, with suggestions as to use. Very many can be discarded right away. There is one point you could settle at once. At what point do you want to take up the tale ? If it goes back too far the resultant effect will be to make it look like snippets. I wonder what you would think of beginning with a very brief sentence or two and plunging right into Chamberlain's announcement of war. The rest follows almost automatically - the fall of France, blood and tears, battle of Britain, the Middle East, U.S. in. Africa, Italy, air attacks on Germany, D. day Paris liberated, Arnhem, the Rhine crossing

3. At the B.B.C. they have made a rule that any such work done involving any member of the recording dept. must be done after office hours as over time and must be paid for by the user. I shall see what this will amount to, ask George to mention remuneration amounts and let you know.

As to anything for me wait till we see what actually I do do ; we can settle that when you come.

I think the album could be made a fine thing and I also think it would sell but probably more in the Dominions and the U.S. than here For one reason there is a curious absence of gramophones ; quite casually I asked some dozen of friends and colleagues ; neither they nor I now possess a gramophone!

I was much interested in your enclosure. This question of secrecy is one that democratic government has got to face or rather government has got to face now that there is no longer a governing class which can keep a secret or fail to keep it But I don't think that the Senator is on a good wicket. It is quite possible to make defence plans on the assumption that we shall need X number of anything whether it is rifles shells or bombs In war we never have enough on the most generous estimates cf. the striking failure of Germany France and Britain to estimate shell consumption in a modern war which led to a compulsory stalemate in the late summer of 1914 Actually the numbers of bombs or of anything else never affect the numbers of forces ; any forces can always fire all that is available and ask for more. Even if every Russian city is bombed and that isn't possible there would still be the Russian army and air force, and ~~the effect on~~ morale and the will to fight under atom bombardment is not likely to be affected any more than it was for long under ordinary bombs There is some interetsing stuff in Gisevius' book on that showing that bombardment increased solidairty with an unpopular regime and morale was affected only when the field armies got beaten

Here there is next to no news. We have all hailed the loss of Eire and Attlee's message signed by H.M. was about as tactless and silly as even that little englander (Clem not H.M.) has done yet I shall send you an article I wrote for today's HERALD as a prelim. to the conference opening on Thursday which is the beginning of the funeral proper of the British Empire. The questioner to Dulles was right - which takes precedence the safety of Western civilisation or the freedom of colonial peoples (allowing for a lot of variation in the meaning of "freedom")? My view would be the first but it isn't shared by the Government I think that Clem honestly believes in the wickedness of coercing any one except the British taxpayer and would be quite glad to see the Empire a loose amalgam to be called by any name one likes nor would be sorry to see it an assemblage of independent states for which we here would have no responsibility. But he is up against the problem of subject races and difference of civilisations which would, if the present evolution is continued, end the whole business as Smuts sees. Bevin on the other hand would I think like the Commonwealth reduced to an alliance of peoples of British blood all independent for only in that way could he abandon Empire preferences and enter a United States of Europe. And of course no one sees yet how to feed the Commonwealth much less the world. Having countered nature's remedies of floods, famine and pestilence we are now condemned to reduce population by atrocious war or see artificially induced starvation.

The municipal elections were significant but not too much so. Partly local issues decide and rancour and isappointment are given rein in a contest which doesn't much matter as would not be given in a general election. The Budget had little to do with the results which had begun to be unfavourable to the Labour boys before Cripps divulged anything. But one thing I do think made a great difference and that was the shock administered by the reduction in the meat ration. We don't eat meat at home at all and even we were affected by the news that each ordinary citizen was down to 8d worth per week. The moral effect of the butcher's notice "Possessors of one book only are asked to apply for the meat ration fortnightly as the amount allotted weekly is too small to make distribution possible" was catastrophic in effect.

Beyond that nix. The troubles are just beginning ; mercifully Russia has as many troubles as we have.

I am very much distressed to hear that you are in the doctor's charge You have I suppose been overdoing it as usual. But I do hope that it is only over work and nothing else. If you get away for two months to this country couldn't you contrive to make the first three weeks a real rest. Why not take a banana boat from San Fransisco and laze from there to here via Panama I belive it takes just over three weeks and it would be a rest. Take nothing with you except gibbon and relax. I shall hope to have news soon that overwork is all it is and that a way has been found to make you work less or to get a rest.

Our best love to Casey, Janet and yourself and auf wiedersehen

My dear Ed, To-day (20th Apr.) I posted you a copy of the Herald & took the address (your home one) from my address book & have a terrible feeling that that was not the address to which I sent the 2½ page letter on the 17th. Lindsay tells me you've been changing houses & are on the point of so doing. So

(A) I may have sent it to the new address which I got off a letter

OR

(B) I may have sent it to some one else's address in N.Y.C. – I seem to have Miss Campbell's an adopted niece of mine or a journalistic friend now seem to resemble the one I used

OR

(C) I may have made no mistake at all

The point is – did you get the letter of 2½ pages & if NOT would you let me know. I'll repeat it once.

In the meantime I am apologetically

My dear Ed.,

I had hardly written you when I got a letter from George Barnes much delayed by having gone to Folkestone saying that he had the records. I went up to No.49 and asked them if they were writing or cabling you to let you know that they had arrived and this merely confirms that fact. I gather from George that J.B. Clark will be charge of all arrangements so I am going to contact him and hear the records before anything else Then that will give me an idea of what you want from this side. Then I'll draw up a rough outline and after you have approved will proceed to go through the hundreds of records here and make some sort of selcetion and have it ready for you when you come.

From what George writes I am given the impression that a major eye is directed towards sales in the U.S. Is that right ? If it is then I take it that "doubles" with your first series are not wanted unless they are by nature unavoidable. It will take sometime to hear the records J.B. has amassed over the years so you have plenty of time to let me have - when you have an off mom any ideas you may have that I can't be expected to glean merely from hearing your records. After I have heard them and had a talk with J.B. I 'll write again.

No news since I wrote . Can't you restrain the over entusiastic ?! If one of those tomatoes had hit Ernie we would now have been at war with Israel and all the United Nationsif necessary If you hear anything on the military side of the Pact do tell me. The view here and I think - only think mind you-that it comes from an American strategist is that 20 divisions fully trained and equipped will be able to hold the Russians on the Rhine until American troops - or atom bombs arrive I wonder what Comrades Vassilevski and Sokolovski think of that when they have sixty divisions almost ready for a converging advance. Their appointment is the most sinister thing so far, I don't say that it is a war appointment and nothing else but it does mean that the Russian war machine will be efficient for the vital first phase There won't be any phony war this time unless of course it suits Moscow to give the fifth columns a long chance I think that if it comes to war the Russians will do a blitz in the west but they might take all Asia first and who is to stop them? Nehru? Israel ? or the only divisions we have in the West ? A nice situation. The one hope is that the new team in the Russian war office wont be able to overcome the native inefficiency and that the machine won't be able to be driven hard or at least any harder than it was in 1944 when it broke down at least three times.

we've about 9 now all Bonnets & Berets

Well well ; we shall see. All our love to the three of you

My dear Ed.,

This is indeed good news that you are to be over here next (i.e. in the Scottish sense this) summer as ever was and I am mighty glad I'm in London again so that there will be no chance of missing you. I didn't answer at once first because I wanted to wait for the records second because I hoped to have news good or bad according to taste about the B.B.C. business In neither case has there been anything to report so I write.

I expect the records are held up in the customs things take ages to get done in the managerial version of the servile state and it is no use writing to ask. One must just wait I have now waited seventeen months for an innocuous book through a bookseller who has a licence. All he has had is the invice from the Amrican pubishers ; all I have had is information to that effect. The old days had their drawbacks but managerially they were efficient. There are some nice remarks on the new economics in that connection in Moritz Bonn's reminiscences I saw him the other day ; he is getting old and has the curious aspect of a rabbinical fawn.

I'd love to do the editing or rather help you with it for I should expect to be fully instructed. I shall be interested to hear of the B.B.C. reactions. Lindsay I haven't seen but I hope to do so shortly. We've been busy with one thing or another and although I waste a lot of time as usual I have got more to do than I thought I would

There's no news really .. Lady Milner I am told is better but she had to go to hospital so it seems to have a bit more serious than was at first thought. I am gradually lessening my work for Lady Rhondda partly because there is less military staff to do and partly because she is relying more and more on outsiders who are uncertain and expensive and so desires to economise. I don't mind for I have got enough for my needs and now have a day extra to do things in. Every one else seems to be well ; at least there are no reports to the contrary.

I suppose you will attend the Atlantic Pact. It may have its defects but it has this merit that the democracies will have to fight if they are attacked. In that respect it is an advance on Munich ; otherwise there is a dreadful similarity to 1938. I don't think the Russians will press things the way Hitler did ; they haven't the compulsion under which he laboured. They are more likely to retard our preparations by a spot of appeasement of their own coupled no doubt with alarums and excusrions. I wonder really if all our governments realise what they are in for. Certainly the peoples don't or you wouldn't have the Harold Wilsons of this country ; the pro-Indonesians in Australia (coupled with extreme "white Australianism") and those in your country who still disbelieve in colonial powers. We are now going to reap the reward of Attlees's Indian policy by upsetting the Commonwealth constitutionally and taking on the defence of an indefensible India. Either we should write off Asia all of us and leave it to be reorgainsed by Eurasia, or reconquer it. A Russian conquest of all Asia might well mean the break up of the Bolshevik empire. I get very tired of the controversies which the "fellow travellers" fan, and it is about time the members of an alliance (for if it isn't an alliance if it isn't "ganging up" as Mr Bevin says it isn't it hasn't any meaning) spending most of their time failing to agree with each other. -often on subjects which don't concern the complainer I had to listen to a a long account of French American and British differences over Germany a scandalous wate of time, when the only thing that is of any importance at all is on which side are the potential hundred German divisions going to be.

But of politics enough. When are we to expect you in this country It will be good to see you ; you are much missed.

Our united love to Janet, Casey and yourself Of Casey it was delightful to hear Of course he is more intelligent than most adults ; children and cats always are. It is the supreme task of parenthood to keep them intelligent and honest - possibly it is at bottom the same thing

Auf wiedersehen

P.S. 1 I agree with you about television in the abstract technical sense But is it absolutely certain that the new generations won't go to news reels etc for news? I rather fear - the Daily Mirror's circulation (incientally the sending ofits editor to prison for the worst contem t of court case in my experience has been the best thing that has happened to Fleet Street for years) is now 4½ million!!

P.S. 2 Please my best wishes to Larry, Charles and Dick Hottelet.

Clark, R.T.

August 5, 1948

My dear R.T.: Clark

Yours of July 25th reached me on the West Coast where I was spending a few days visiting my parents. I don't know that there is anything I can say about the political scene over here that is not already apparent to you. Certainly you can expect the stagnation of such statesmanship as we possess to continue until after the election. The conventions were rather disgusting spectacles--both parties having had candidates imposed upon them that they really didn't want.

The current spy scare will get worse, more confusing and less important. We are, as you know, an intemperate people.

I was deeply distressed to hear of Geoffrey Pike's suicide, but it was pleasant to learn Jules is quite recovered.

I would like to raise with you again the possibility of your spending a few weeks in this country. Wouldn't "Time and Tide" and the "Glasgow Herald" be interested in some election dope? I could easily provide the dollars necessary for your maintenance while here in addition to bed and breakfast in a reasonably comfortable house. You would be surprised--and I hope pleased, at the number of the old CBS London gang who would be much pleasured to see you over here, and I think you might find the story of more than just passing interest. What about it?

Both Janet and Casey flourish. Casey now lives in a world that is peopled almost exclusively by monkeys, lions and fire engines. He has not yet learned to take his half pint of mild and bitters, but I have hope.

As ever yours,

July 25

My dear Ed.,

Once I saw that you weren't coming I delayed writing you partly because I thought you would be fully occupied with the conventions partly because there was little to say and partly because I had a fit of doing-nothing-ness due perhaps to depressing weather and to equally depressing situations in general. However the conventions are over ; the weather is hot sunny but with a sea breeze and if I go on doing nothing much longer I shall be in the poorhouse.

I am sending in another envelope a little essay on present discontents, also a begging request so I shan't touch work or politics in this. I'll just give you what news there is. So far as we are concerned there is none ; we go on living here ; I go on writing for "T. and T." and the "Glasgow Herald" and keep the income tax to a point where I can pay it I had to stretch a point and earn a little more since I'm now in the Health Service - God help it and us - which costs me 6s 2d per week and so far I can't see that I can possibly get a thing out of it until I am 69 ; if I die Jo gets £20 to bury but I don't really see how that profits me and to make it profitable for her I shall have to leave my body to the hospitals

The old news department is now gone for good and in its stead reigns a gigantic sausage machine which puts out in all languages except Latin fifty nine odd bulletins per twenty four hours. Haley got rid of Macgregor, -yan having left for the TIMES and the editor in chief is the New Zealander Tahu Hole who brings to the task knowledge experience and ambition but I doubt if he has the physical and mental reserves necessary to stand the strain. The net result is that all the old lot who could write for the wireless are now exceutives and the writing is lousy to a degree ; it reminds one much more of an Attlee broadcast than the old news. Michael who hasn't been well they have shelved to do Parliament which disappoints him but gives him a chance to get fit in a backwater. I see them all occasionally and we often talk of Janet and you They are all getting old look tired and seem to have lost interest Haley flourishes I hope only in the manner of the Psalmist's green bay tree.

You remember Geoffrey Pike ; he committed suicide three months ago ; couldn't stand up to the strain of peace and felt himself unequal to his tasks. Jules is quite recovered but hasn't taken a job yet till he is passed absolutely fit. I haven't looked in to Hallam St. lately but will do so almsot at once.

The rest being political you'll get that in the other letter. I was awfully pleased to get your letter ; there are many things I miss but none more than you Are you going to the U.N. in Paris ? even if it is a waste of time I hope you are for there might be a chance of seeing you. Please give our best love to Janet and my avuncular regards to Casey ; I hope he has not taken to snuff yet. And to you all that you wish for yourself

In some haste but as always

Yours

K.T.

And of course God bless.

July 18

My dear Ed.,

Please forgive me being so long in answering your urgent letter but I was trying to see if there was any way in which I could find a chance to go to the States And there just in's't I am tied here by the necessities of work. The stuff I have to do they want regularly and as I am not on any salary list but really a free lance I have got to go on supplying it. Maybe later on if things change I'll manage it but not this year. It was more than kind of Janet and you to offer me that generous hospitality and I only wish I could have accepted it. Especially so because it would have given me the chance to see you all again. I miss you a lot you know.

For the same reason I'm sorry you had to give up the project but I am much more grieved to hear the reason for it. I am glad there is nothing so wrong that rest won't cure it. It must be a pretty hectic life you have to lead and I do hope that you will be able to get a good holiday. And when you do, really rest body as well as mind Thousand mile motor trips and/or two rounds of golf a day aren't a rest. Go and lie on your back in hot sun where there is a breeze and let your mind go blank ; it needs a rest too And if you must read read the old stuff I've given you this advice FROM EXPERIENCE but you never take it. Never mind here it is all over again.

As to recompenses don't be silly. I did no more than rough out a sketch and check up some records and these can wait until you feel like having another shot at it. I think later on you could make a less comprehensive record but a better one by confining it to the great period roughly, their finest hour i,e. from Prague to the turn of the tide which really turned at Pearl Harbour. The entry into war of the U.S. would make a fine ending.

By mail there goes a long letter to you on politics and what not and therein I do ask you to do something for me. It will be explained there but recompense - no.

Things go all right. I have to work harder than I want with a paragraph everyday, an article every week and occasional articles in between and then people do send me things to review or report on. I get time to read in reason but no time to do anything permanent. Maybe I will one day but it won't matter if I don't. But I wish I didn't have to live in London. It is more tiring to take a bus home from Fleet Street than to take a train home to Folkestone.

Of news I have none. Lady Milner I haven't seen yet but I gather she is better though I think age is at last beginning totell. She has given up the National Review which Ned Grigg is now editing and not so well though possibly more profitably. I don't see much of the old lot except Michael who flourishes and desires his love to be sent you both. John Coatman retires this October and has got a job as research fellow in St. Andrews on broadcasting of all things a post that pleases him immensely and causes raised eyebrows in B.H. Lindsay is on holiday and I haven't seen him for some time. I gather that his position under Haley's series of reorganisations isn't as comfortable as it was.

I went the other day to a diplomatic corps reception by the U.S. Press Office in London. It was strange not seeing any at all of the old faces that I use to see at your parties. Mallory Brown was the only American except Howard whom I knew; you remember once dumping him in my cubby hole. Knickerbocker is a loss though I never thought him a great journalist.

And at the end though it should have come first, thank you so much for remembering my sixtieth birthday. Looking back it seems a long time — after all I did see Queen Victoria - but looking forward to what must be a relatively restricted time it seems much longer - the next stage I mean. But your telegram at once touched me and pleased me and - do send you warmest thanks.

The serious stuff in the mailed letter. For the moment just our jo joint affection to the three of you and I shall still say with confidence Auf wiedersehen. That and please take care of yourself.

Yours ever

RT

My dear Ed.,

I have given Janet all the personal news and so this is for your particular attention. I feel very guilty in having been so remiss in writing to you but now that we have so to say settled down I am hoping to do better. At least I am back in the old business and in touch once again. I didn't want to come back but Bill Robieson who edits my old paper the Glasgow Herald was so insistent that I take over the diplomatic correspondent's job properly that I couldn't resist So I'm back in London writing paragraphs every night and doing a couple of articles a week either diplomatic or military

The situation is very obscure. So far as conditions of living are concerned they have improved. That is to say that, rationing apart, there are more things in the shops particularly from the Continent mainly eatables and, though dear, provide welcome variety There are also more things because the flood of money has dried up. There is still no value in money but there is less of it partly because of the incidence of taxation for the new services e.g. I have in addition to income-tax to pay 6s 2d a week as a self-employed person. For that I don't get unemployment pay but I can draw sick pay ; Jo gets £20 with which to bury me and a widow's pension and if I live to be 69 I can draw a pension of 23s 6d a week. On the other hand there are no doctor's bills if I need a doctor and I can when needed get a new set of teeth or new spectacles all for nothing When the service started there was a rush such as they might have expected but didn't with the result that Nye was sixty millions under estimated. I can't but foresee new taxation this year to meet all the new demands.

The difficulty is that there has been no real let up from anxiety - anxiety as to the future both financial and political People are still very tired and there is the natural "I couldn't care less" attitude to most things and a good deal of scepticism at the propsect of our really winning through before a war throws everything back again. The war fear is very real but none talks about it. No one sees any reason why it should come ; everybody believes that it will come and no one is prepared to do very much about it. The Communist influence is now very marked and the government is doing very little to tackle it. The trade unions and government departments are well infiltrated and the result is strikes and spy troubles and a general troubling of the waters The working class as such is still sound but it combines the old suspicion of hard work for the bosses' profit with the Communist view that effort strengthens a reactionary government which sooner or later will welcome a diversionary war with Russia. There is a very distinct slacking as well as effort and it is hard to say which will win.

The government itself is still pretty firmly in the saddle. If the middle class is being slowly extinguished as we knew it, there is a new middle class arising of higher paid workers and on the whole the times are still not so hard as to prevent the great majority of people being better off in the sense of having more money. Also a generation is growing up which is ignorant of the past ; it doesn't remember when you got drunk for a penny and dead drunk for twopence or when Woodbines were one penny for five instead of being 1s 4d for ten It feels better off than in the war years and it naturally ascribes that to the government. I shall be very surprised if they lose more than 70 seats at next year's election They haven't lost a by-election yet though they could lose Hammersmith North this week and the hold they have on the majority isn't shaken. The Lynskey tribunal didn't shake them at all thanks to Attlee's promptness in having a tribunal and the disappearnce of Belcher who is much more a fool than a knave The general Labour view was that had it been a Tory government it would have been much worse.

I think Oct. is the earliest possible date.

The changes in the Cabinet will not be very great. I think Alexander must go. Attlee wants Mountbatten to become either Minister of Defence or Minister of Labour but I gather the services don't want him and the King slightly disapproves as M. is too near the Throne.

The other consideration is Ernie Bevin's health. He is not so much a sick man as a completely worn out man and he wants himself to go altogether, I gather, though he might take a lesser job. This is on medical recommendation. The favourite for the succession is Herbert but Herbert wants to go on being leader of the House and doesn't see anyone who could take over his election job. In eighteen months he might feel differently but I gather he is most reluctant to change at present. There is a suggestion that he might become P.M. and Attlee go to the Foreign Office but Clem is none too well and naturally doesn't want to step down. There is no chance of Bevin becoming P.M. On all hands I am assured that the Party would not like him as P.M. even if he were well ; they don't want a Trade unionist there.

The same objection is made to Jim Griffiths either for P.M. or for Foreign Secretary and there is a curious veering round to put Nye Bevin at the F.O. Although he excites Tory passions more than any one I am assured that there is no sterner hater of Communists than he and that in the Cabinet he is more often on the right than the left whatever he may be outside He wants a change too I am told What will happen I don't know It can't happen immediately. A real anti-Muscovite would be a gain at the F.O. Ernie is losing his grip. He is after all the most English foreign minister we have had since Cromwell He comes from the south which is the real England and straight from the land and he has all the prejudices of the south He hates Jews and intellectuals and still more hates those whom he has judged wrongly like the Zionists and the Bolsheviks. He is becoming most ungarded in speech and regards every one as out of step except himself His belief that he is being steadily stabbed in the back is almost pathological and isn't confined to members of his own part like the ineffable Crossman but extends to U.S. Senators and Secrtaries In fact his period of usefulness is ended

The difficulty is less at the F.O. than at the defence ministry. Alexander has quite failed in getting the services to work as one and the state of our defences isn't pleasant That is partly because Attlee the pacifist won't say why we must arm and partly because we have faced neither the social nor financial problems. We have not worked out either what we can spare from industry or made the conditions such as encourage recruiting ; indeed it is questionable even if conditions of service were improved as they ought to be we could get recruits to the regulars unless there is a real unemployment Full employment really is inconsistent with a standing army and navy unless there is a foolproof scheme of selective conscription. National service as we run it is virtually a failure, but the alternatives are not squarely faced

As to foreign affairs the less said the better. We simply have not got a policy and in the F.O. there are at least half a dozen mutually contradictory, while other departments run their own policies. I think it is true to say that, as compared with pre-1914, the F.O. is staffed with inferior though often abler men, ~~but~~; they see too much and nothing steadily and so they run policy in compartments. We recognise the Communist menace and seek to divert by appeasement not of the Kremlin but of national Communist parties. We refuse to supply Russia but we supply Poland with the wherewithal for mobilisation. We want to recognise the Communists in China, massacre the Communists in Malaya and try to compel the Dutch to let Communism have free reign in Indonesia. We don't face the fact that a totalitarian state being the most powerful state in the old world we must use a similar conception against it and that the test of all policy is does it make for victory in the coming war. I fear that lack of appreciation extends to the U.S. where historical sympathy with any colonial unrest is now not only out of date but dangerous. We cannot afford to let any part of the world slip and so we can't let colonial movements have their own way If the U.S.—Australian policy in Indonesia wins we shall have a state of things worse than in Burma and all the resources there will be denied to us. The nuisance is that we believe in our vocabulary and so are at a complete disadvatage vis a vis the Russians who don't one bit believe in theirs Indivividual freedom is one thing ; political freedom is another and I don't belive that political freedom ever ought to mean freedom to commit wither murder or suicide and that is about what our definition of freedom amounts to just now.

The loss of prestige which we have suffered in the Middle East and in Asia is incalculable but when we can't deal even with the Irish what can one expect ? Costello gave us the opportunity. All we had to do was to say that if the Republic were proclaimed the Irish were aliens Instead of that we create a new category of "non-foreign aliens" with all the rights of British subjects and we are then astonished when within the Commonwealth there arises claims to similar privileges. It would have been possible to have said that the ideal of the white Commonwealth was union under the symbol of the Throne and that that was the test for the non-white dominions. India and the others would have been faced with a fact andwould have orientated themselves according to taste, but there would have been no anomalies. We consecrate the Irishman in his belief that he is an anomaly and a privileged one at that and then are surprised when the Indians want to be anomalous too. It is a queer reversal of fate In 1914 I was against Ulster now in 1949 I'm for it.

Otherwise I don't think there is much more to commeaton. I shall try to write regularly a nd on your part send me a card if there is an thing you want me to discuss or to find out for you. I won 20s on Truman at 20 to 1.!!

God bless you and auf wiedersehen.

My dear Ed.,

I delayed sending you any more notes until I got the new cabinet late last night. The impressions were gathered in town today I'm also adding some cuttings on the "Fascist peril" Sorenson is the conventional stuff. Rebecca's is the result of a prolonged investigation rather courageously carried out on the spot. I fancy they are syndicated stuff and so you may have already seen them but I send them in case. The letters to the editor are interesting ; they do represent a new form of anti-Jewism as a dircet result of Palestine That is one thing that should not be neglected ; the anti-Americans are using the American Zionists the Ben hecht crowd for anti-American propaganda among people who are non-political but who have sons etc in Palestine Luckily the time now is short but a good deal of damage has been done and as the new Comintern is going to make all the fifth columnists anti-American it is a pity that this handle should be given.

We have almost settled in now ; just a few oddments to get.

Did I tell you Ryan had gone to the "Times" , Macgregor is now O.C. all news which is to b consolidated in one service. Poor old Mac ; he was selected because "he was unlikely to object to anything that his bosses would decide" The B.B.C. news is virtually dead as we know it.

Jules is out of danger and is home but no visitors yet.
I've just got an invitation to meet you and Janet at a cocktail party so it does look as if you were coming come hell and high water. It'll be good to see you both again.

I'm still quite busy but I haven't had time yet to get anything worth while started. I've resisted any approaches from the B.B.C. because I'm beginning to develop new theories of "talks" The Third Programme ones are so bad that I'm sure the method of the outsider is wrong. Besides there are not enough outsiders to go round and it is rather pitiable to see people with a reputation in their own small circle throw it away on the air J.B. Priestley despite his faults is still our best broadcaster. I expect you are settled into your daily disquisition. I tried to get you one night but the omens were all unfavourable. However I saw you quoted in the Times ; there was a pleasant air of finality the way it was done.

All the best from us both to the three of you and auf wiedersehen

RT

The crisis isn't any better and the changes in the government haven't brought any relief. Cripps's appointment is a sound one from the economic point of view but psychologically it isn't good for Cripps has no appeal and to many he appears un-English. He is too divorced from the ordinary run of people and shows no appreciation of individual needs or problems. The mere fact that he will be coldly scientific and again un-English, outweighs the fact that he won't do the silly class war act of the Isaacs, Tomlinsons and Shinwells.

The reconstruction was done in the usual halfhearted way we now associate with Clem. He has alienated people without quashing them. He refused to drop wither Shinwell or Nye and it was only after Horner had tried to dictate to him that Morrison persuaded him that he couldn't keep Shinwell in the cabinet without loss of dignity. So Nye is sore at not getting the Supply Ministry and Shinwell is out to make trouble at the War Office, sore at exclusion from the Cabinet Of the new people Hugh Gaitskell may do well at the Fuel Ministry but from the staffing point of view this is the worst ministry of the lot It was I think a tactical blunder not to appoint a good T.U. man here Already the miners are talking of the old school tie and Gaitskell is after all a second rate economist no more.

Alexander and Barnes both stay and every one is asking why if they do stay Greenwood had to be dropped ; after all Arthur is drinking no more, indeed probably less, than he has done for years. Strauss was Cripps's choice ; indeed into the economic posts Cripps has got his own people On the other hand the juniors are mainly Morrison men notably Patrick Gordon Walker who with Phil Baker as his chief will have the work to do at the Dominions Office though he won't get the limelight yet. Freeman, Callaghan and Younger are all good choices ; at least they get their chance. The mystery of course is the retention of old George Tomlinson at the Education Office. Isaacs was kept because he is a Bevin man.

On the succession question the changes throw no light. Ostensibly Bevin and Cripps are infront and Morrison a little in the background but only apparently He is not too well yet and can afford to wait. Cripps is the "unlucky" type and, if he fails to solve the crisis Morrison will be there to take advantage of the failure probably just at the time when the international situation allows solution. I do not regard Cripps as in the running for the succession and I think High is losing ground. But if you remember what happened when Bonar Law was the unexpected third, keep your eye on Chuter Ede It wouldn't surprise me if the choice fell on him.

On the whole the T.U. side has had the worst of it and the intellectuals the better But only the "loyal" intellectuals have profited. None of the "rebels" have been considered and they are out to make ~~tro~~ trouble.

That is where the new Cominform may play its part. Here it isn't regarded as a sign of strength but rather of weakness due to trouble in the Balkans which we now are told is soluble so far as Moscow is concerned only by bringing in the satellites to the Soviet Union as federated republics. This at least would be an essential preliminary. But here they regard it more as an attempt to mobilise France and Italy against the Marshall plan ; after all these are the only countries where the Communists - except Sweden perhaps - count as parties. The effort will be to split the Socialist parties and take over numbers of them As you know there are a lot of people here in the Labour party in the House and elsewhere who ought to be in thet C.P. The manifesto of our C.P. cocealing its dismay at the fact that it wasn't considered important enough to be asked to join, simply goes baldheaded for division ; it sets its aim at helping the Left to get rid of the ministers who are "reactionary", and preventing Britain falling into American clutches, a cry that is echoed by Shinwell and might wake other echoes.

At the moment though we don't care. The one thing is if we increase goods for export can we sell them? When you remember that our car target is almost equal to the total world export of cars in 1939 you can see what chances we have of selling them. And no one has answered that problem yet. The trouble will come when we can't sell not when we can't or won't make.

There is nothing ahead except Dalton's anti-inflationary budget. and the T.U. claims for wages increases. Cripps says they cannot be met ; Shinwell and the Left say they can. I imagine there will a lot more hardship and cetainly trouble before Xmas.

On defence there is little new. We are getting out of Palestine and the Mediterranean i.e. if the Russians will give us time to get out The story is that Kenya is to be the big base and Africa the foundation of Western restoration a long term business and they haven't got started yet. The Imperial Conference coinciding with the wedding won't be as important as thought because one or two premiers are not coming. The is no Commonwealth scheme ; there is a scheme for dividing up defence into packets e.g. Australia to be totally responsible east of Singapore - a fatal scheme But Attlee is determined to save on the forces and he won't be easy to defeat in the present temper of the party It is entirely half hearted on the European federation ; it doesn't really belive in the U.N. ; it's frightened of having clear second place to the U.S. and it can't escape its powerful wing that is pro-Russian. So it will go on being "independent"!!

THE TIME

SEDITIOUS LIBEL CHARGE

Times 14 X

ALLEGED ANTI-JEWISH ARTICLE

James Caunt, proprietor, publisher, and editor of the Morecambe and Heysham Visitor, of Under Fell, Burton, near Carnforth, appeared before the Morecambe magistrates yesterday to answer a summons brought under the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, charging him with having published a seditious libel arising out of an alleged anti-Jewish article which appeared in the newspaper on August 6.

Mr. A. Denis Gerrard, K.C., and Mr. Glynn Blackledge appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. G. O. Slade, K.C., with Mr. T. G. Roche for the defence.

Mr. Gerrard asked for the summons to be amended by the deletion of the words "contrary to section eight of the Law of Libel Amendment Act" and the substitution of "against the peace." It was stated later that the Bench agreed.

Counsel said that people were entitled within very wide limits indeed to say what they had to say or wished to say on controversial matters, but there came a point at which, in the interests of the preservation of the peace and in the interests of good government, the criminal law stepped in and said "this has gone beyond the bounds of legitimate controversy and threatens to interfere with the King's peace." In this case, the Crown submitted that the matter had gone to the limits which the criminal law prescribed for controversy.

STATE OF TENSION

Counsel continuing said that in this case an editor was writing for public consumption in times when tension existed, and when tension existed it was extremely dangerous to throw a little petrol on the fire. This article might have accomplished everything Mr. Caunt ought to have wished, having regard to his views, if it had stopped a little earlier. He had no need to suggest that violence was probably the only thing to bring "those people to a sense of their responsibility." Mr. Caunt had suggested the word "boycott," and a complete ostracizing of the Jewish community. Think of the tension that would be brought about by that. A boycott of that magnitude would cause great tension and sooner or later one side or the other would break down.

A copy of the editorial said to have been written by Mr. Caunt was then read by counsel. It said:—

> There is very little about which to rejoice greatly except the pleasant fact that only a handful of Jews bespoil the population of our borough. The foregoing sentence may be regarded as an outburst of anti-semitism. It is intended to be, and we make no apologies, neither do we shirk any responsibilities or repercussions.

It then referred to the shooting in Palestine of a 21-year-old youth from a neighbouring district, and complimented the Daily Express on publishing pictures of the bodies of two British sergeants hanging from eucalyptus trees. Protests from various sections of British Jewry were referred to as "blatant hypocrisy" and "face-saving propaganda."

EXTRACTS FROM ARTICLE

In the course of the reading of the article by counsel, the following passages also occurred:—

> It is not sufficient for British Jews who have been proved to be the worst black-market offenders to rush into print with howls of horror and sudden wreaths and cenotaphs.
> Instead they should disgorge their ill-gotten wealth in trying to dissuade their brothers in the United States from pouring out dollars to facilitate the entrance into Palestine of European Jewish scum, a proportion of whom will swell the ranks of the terrorist organization and thus carry on the murderous work which British Jewry professes to abhor. . . .
> There is a growing feeling that Britain is in the grip of the Jews. There are more Jewish M.P.s than at any time in its history, and for the purpose of emphasis we repeat that if any analysis could be made of the people convicted of black market offences the Jewish community in Britain would come out an easy first. . . .
> The Jews indeed are a plague on Britain, and unless they are put in their place by the will of the people then eventually they will do more harm to this fair isle than ten of the approaching economic crises. . . .
> If British Jewry is suffering to-day from the righteous wrath of British citizens, then they have only themselves to blame for their passive inactivity. Violence may be the only way to bring them to the sense of their responsibility to the country in which they live.

Mr. Slade, opening the case for the defence, said that it had been stated that a Judge in Chambers had to give permission for the prosecution to be brought. It must not be thought that because a judge had given permission for a prosecution "there must be something in it." If the magistrates took that view it would mean that something designed for the protection of an editor would be used as a weapon against him. The magistrates had to put themselves in the position of the jury at the trial, and if in their opinion, after hearing the evidence, they felt they would acquit Mr. Caunt they could dismiss the case and not allow the matter to proceed farther. The defence contended that it was fantastic to suggest that this was a seditious libel. They were fighting it tooth and nail and were standing for freedom of speech.

MR. CAUNT IN THE BOX

Mr. Caunt, giving evidence, said that he had been associated with the Morecambe and Heysham Visitor for 30 years and had been editor for the past nine. The paper was an independent weekly, with no political complexion, circulating in the borough of Morecambe, Lancaster, and surrounding districts, with a circulation of 17,800 pegged. It was founded in 1874. It was usual for the editorial leader to be headed "Mustard and Cress," but this was not the first time that the words "and Cress" had been omitted in the heading. During his connexion with the paper he had not published an alleged anti-Semitic article before the one on August 6.

Examined by Mr. Slade, the witness said that he visited the United States in 1946 and, travelling between New York and Hollywood, he saw anti-British propaganda in newspapers and on hoardings, published by Jews. When he read about the death of a Blackpool district youth in Palestine and saw the pictures of British sergeants hanging from eucalyptus trees, he decided to write the article. He honestly did not think that Jewish expressions of horror at the Palestine outrages were genuine. He never intended, however, to mean that the British Jews were conniving at murder in Palestine. He was definitely of the opinion that if an analysis was made of people convicted of black market offences the Jewish community in Britain would come out an easy first. In writing that unless the Jews were put in their place by the will of the people he meant by the usual democratic channels, like the ballot box. He did not mean to incite people to commit violence.

The witness continuing said that he had not intended "to throw a little petrol on the fire when tension existed" and was not advocating the use of violence, or inciting people to commit more violence. He had never intended to subvert the constitution of this country and to stir up strife between the communities.

Mr. Caunt agreed with counsel that what he was telling the magistrates was that, unless the Jewish people did something about the Palestinian problem, he must warn them that they might suffer from the violence of non-Jewish people.

The Bench found there was a case to answer and Mr. Caunt was accordingly committed for trial at the next Lancaster Assizes. He was granted bail in his own recognisance of £100.

BOMBED-SITE FRUIT MAKES THE JAM

From wild fruit gathered from London bombed sites, and from trees and bushes on Hampstead Heath, Mr. D. M. Landale, 47-year-old stoker, of Highgate-road, Kentish Town, has made 15 varieties of jam.

His products won a special prize at a local allotment show.

At his home dozens of pots of jam, which have cost him nothing but time and trouble in collecting the fruit and making the jam, are stored ready for use.

"There is good food going to waste on nearly every bombed site in London, if only one knows what to look for," said Mr. Landale.

"The trouble is that 90 per cent of Londoners go about with their eyes shut. Some of the most despised fruits and berries make the most delicious jams. I spend hours walking around likely spots in search of the fruit.

Horse mint

"One jam which anyone can make from materials which are easily obtainable is a mixture of hawthorn berries and elderberries.

"There is more of this wild fruit to be had than any other, but people just ignore it."

Other varieties on Mr. Landale's shelves include crab-apple, sloe, wild raspberry and strawberry, horse mint, and haw and elder jelly.

'Take trouble'

In preparing food

SYDNEY, Monday. — Two Adelaide doctors have agreed that insufficient attention to meals is one of the reasons why temporary complaints of the digestive system are the most prolific cause of lost time among Australian working people.

One specialist said the trouble probably arises partly in the cooking and partly in the speed of eating. People would not take enough trouble in preparing good food.

He said that functional troubles of the stomach were much more frequent during the last war than during the 1914-18 war.

Stress, strain, worry and uncertainty were producing what might be called "nervous indigestion," he said.—Reuter

PROBLEM No. 1 —HOW TO BEAT 'THE BARRIER'

Evening Standard Air Reporter

British aircraft scientists now studying the results of the launching last week of the first faster-than-sound rocket-airplane, are planning to reach 1000 mph in the next stage of their experiments.

Trials off the Cornish coast are to go on over a long period, and altogether 22 more tiny pilotless airplanes will be flown.

The next four are of the same type as that launched on Wednesday—with straight wings. These are aimed to reach 900 mph.

But the rest will have "futurist" wing designs. It is from these that 1000 mph is expected.

The problem of reaching this speed is not one of power but of aerodynamics, and that is what the "boffins" (Back-room experts) from the Royal Aircraft Establishment at Farnborough, Hants, who are carrying out the trials, are seeking to solve—how to design aircraft which will remain controllable as they crash through the "barrier" of the speed of sound.

Too dangerous

This knowledge is needed for designing the airliners of the future, and it is hoped that a lot will be gained from the minute-and-a half flights of the 900 and 1000 mph rocket-planes.

America is said to have exceeded 1000 mph with rocket models, and is now designing single-seater piloted aircraft for supersonic trials.

But we have abandoned as too dangerous any idea of breaking through the "shock-wave barrier" with pilots.

NEWSBRIEFS

Now to teach the parents

Having concentrated on the training and instruction of children during the summer, Beckenham, Kent, Road Safety Committee have decided to devote the winter months to making the parents road-safety conscious.

Plans for their adult campaign include: Competitions for "Safety First," cross-word puzzles and one-act plays, the playing of propaganda gramophone records at public meetings and messages in church magazines.

More than £100 was subscribed towards a "freedom of the road" fund at a meeting arranged by Norfolk Car Club to press for the restoration of the basic petrol ration.

£1550 repair job.—Because the pathway along Station-road, Norwich, is cracking and the river bank giving way, a defective quay heading is to be repaired at a cost of £1550.

3 years to wait

Subscribers on the Streatham telephone exchange have been told by the GPO that the earliest "target" date for conversion of their exchange from manual to automatic is 1950.

Losing money.—Colchester Corporation bus service to Lexden is losing £1000 a year. The route is to be revised.

Cracks have appeared in six council houses which are being built at Clacton, and have been attributed to the hot summer weather.

Three ATS platoons are to be formed in Suffolk. They will be attached to Territorial Army units at Ipswich and Stowmarket.

The new Mayor.—Councillor Eugene Murphy, aged 58, who has worked at Hays Wharf, Bermondsey, since he was 14, is to be next year's Mayor of Deptford, where he has lived all his life.

Lost £20,000.—Norwich Electricity Department lost £20,000 income through the electricity cuts in February and March.

HEADMASTERS 'ON APPRO'

Bishop protests

The Bishop of Barking has protested against Essex Primary Education Committee's approval, for a probationary period only, of appointments made by the managers to the headships of voluntary schools. No probation is stipulated in the case of county council schools.

Mr. E. C. Hardy, vice-chairman of the county education committee, defended the action of the Primary Committee when the Bishop's protest was discussed.

"Sometimes in the past people have been appointed more for their ability to play the organ than for their ability to teach children," he said.

"The committee must satisfy themselves that teaching by people appointed by the managers of voluntary schools is up to the required standard."

The chief education officer, Dr. B. E. Lawrence, said: "The committee have no right to refuse confirmation of an appointment by the managers providing the person concerned is properly qualified."

MAN—AGED 40,000

VERONA, Monday.—A fossilised skeleton of a man, estimated to be of the later Palæolithic Age (that is to say 40,000 or 45,000 years ago), has been found in a cave in the Grezzana zone near Verona.

The bones, which consist of the legs and pelvis, show the man to have been of medium height.—Reuter.

MYSTERY OF 55,000 'LOST' MEN

VIENNA, Monday.—Fifty-five thousand Austrian men who disappeared on the Eastern front during the war are still unaccounted for.

In the last days of the war German statistics of dead, wounded and missing were almost non-existent, and during the past two years the Russians have done little to help the Austrian Red Cross clear up this vast mystery.

There were no accurate lists of prisoners available, prisoners were for many months not allowed to communicate with their homes at all and later only by scanty field postcards as a rule. As a result many Austrian families still remain in complete ignorance of the fate of fathers, husbands, orothers or sons.

Now that Stalin has promised to return the 45,000 prisoners of war which the Russians declare to be all the Austrians left in Russia, it is hoped that more information will be available as to the fate of the 55,000 missing.

It is hoped, however, that a number of the missing will be traced and found still to be alive in the more distant Russian camps and that eventually they will be restored to their waiting families.—Reuter.

'Stop laughing'

It's a serious matter

SYDNEY, Monday.—"These men do not catch rats. Their job is to advise property owners on precautions to prevent the infiltration of rats," Alderman S. C. Molloy told Sydney City Council's Health Committee when urged that the name "rat-catchers" be changed.

"When they produce their authority cards, owners invariably laugh," he continued. "Rat catching is a serious business, and I think it would be more dignified and more in keeping with their duties if the rat-catchers were called 'complaint officers.'"

The committee decided to ask the city Health Officer for his views on the proposal.—Reuter.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN LONDON

First in a new series by

Rebecca West

Rebecca West is the most distinguished woman writer of our time. She has a unique reputation on both sides of the Atlantic.

Miss West has conducted an inquiry, on behalf of the Evening Standard, into the revival of Fascism and anti-Semitism in London.

She has been to the meetings in North and East London, sat in the police courts when cases arising out of the meetings have been heard, investigated the organisations behind the agitation.

Her careful and brilliant analysis is to be published exclusively in the Evening Standard in three sections, starting to-day. THE NEXT SECTION WILL APPEAR NEXT MONDAY.

1 Not a riot but a racket

THE riots which have been going on for some time past in East and North London, round about meetings held by Fascist organisations, are a racket.

They are not spontaneous. They are a mean, cruel, dirty racket, inflicting serious injuries directly on these London districts and indirectly on the whole of England, which certain persons have promoted to serve their own interests.

The pretext these persons have used is the determination of Sir Oswald Mosley to return to politics. That he really hopes to do so is hard to believe. It is, indeed, as if the proposition that Queen Anne is dead were disputed by Queen Anne herself. But he has gone into business as a publisher, and on his list are books, pamphlets, and a news-letter, written by himself in the character of a political leader.

It unfortunately happens that a number of men have gathered together to revive the title of an obscure pre-war organisation named the British League of Ex-Servicemen, and hold various meetings in various parts of London, at which they profess Fascist doctrines as professed by Sir Oswald before the war, sell these new writings of his, and frequently refer to him as "the greatest living Englishman."

These men fall into various categories. Some are men who lack neither intelligence nor education, who are blinded to fact by their admiration for the strong arm stuff of Fascism, and the black magic by which it gave power over the silly, simple people to the knowing little gang. Others are stupid men who are too stupid to recognise a fact if they fell over one.

The worst of these are the kind of stupid men who indicate with a nod and a wink that nobody can fool them, they are much too clever, with a cleverness which tells them that there were no hell camps at Belsen and Buchenwald, and that all the photographs and articles published concerning them were just propaganda invented by the newspapers. There is nothing to do with these people, who mean no harm but have a blind eye for the truth, except wait around with an undertaker. Only death cures such obstinacy.

Others again are not so much stupid people as simpletons: And perhaps it would be fairer to call them saints who have never found the right stuff to be saintly about, who have poured their faith into unworthy vessels. Those are the people who stood by Mosley even after 1937, when the whole world had made up its mind about him, his movement was splitting, and he had become not a menace but a music-hall joke.

ONLY one of all these speakers can make a respectable speech. I do not propose to advertise any of the participants in these disgusting proceedings, so I will only say that the British League can claim one speaker who has a lively mind and considerable command over the tricks of oratory. But even he is not very good, and all his colleagues are bores.

Some of them practise the first-line boredom of inaudibility. They cannot manage the microphone, and fill the surrounding streets with sounds as of a dairy farm just before milking. Others, too audible, are trite and verbose.

Their matter is monotonous. It must be necessarily more restricted than it was before 1939, when they could point to the triumphant achievements and humanitarian characters of Mussolini and Hitler. They now have to rely entirely on anti-Semitism and economic nationalism.

Contrary to popular belief, the Fascist speakers, with very few exceptions, devote far more time to their economic doctrine than to their anti-Jewish campaign. Their attacks on the Jews consist usually of vague references to "international finance," abstract malignity about Palestine, and disclosures of such weighty scandals as that Mr. Litvinoff was born a Finkelstein and Mr. Zinovieff an Apfelbaum.

At far greater length, and with equal passion, do they expatiate on a doctrine of preference within the British Commonwealth which is fundamentally, it must be admitted, not very different from that advocated for long by Lord Beaverbrook and recently by Mr. Bevin. But few would deny that, except on their off days, Lord Beaverbrook and Mr. Bevin do it better.

These Fascist speakers are so extremely ignorant that they cannot be interesting. If you imagine a lecture on radar by somebody who knows nothing about it, but is determined to probe the matter very deeply, you will get the effect.

ON their own power these men could not hold an audience of more than three or four hundred. They could rope in a hundred or two passers-by who had nothing better to do at the moment; and they have about 200 supporters who turn up regularly at all their meetings, none of whom are persons possessed of any influence.

Poor old men, who have found it hard to earn a living all their lives, and find it a relief to be told that they failed not through any fault of their own but because of the wicked Jews. Fierce old ladies, who want somebody to lead them in an attack on the Kremlin. Dotty old ladies, who joined the League because of something a clairvoyant saw in a crystal. Disagreeable people of both sexes, a terrifying number of these: the customer who barks at all waitresses, the waitress who barks at all customers, meet there and side by side howl that Brittern should be for the British.

There are also a number of children, some as young as 13 or 14. These would be, were it not for the action of certain elements, all the audience the British League speakers could expect.

But the Fascist meetings are now attended by two and three thousand people. Indeed, at some of the disturbances that have centred round them, it has seemed to me that four or five thousand people have collected at the place of the meeting and in the surrounding streets. This happens because a number of people who are anti-Fascist go to these meetings to protest against what the Fascists say, and because a far greater number of people go to witness those protests, because they turn into entertaining fights.

NOW it is very natural that certain people should wish to protest against the Fascist speeches, and those are our Jewish fellow-citizens.

At any time it would be enraging to any Englishman of Jewish blood to find a horde of fanatics standing in the streets outside his home and bawling that he had no right to be in his own country, and that he was guilty of all sorts of crimes of which he was in fact innocent, or else he would be in gaol. Now when we know that such talk elsewhere engendered the massacre of innocent Jews, we cannot blame any Jew if he runs mad at the sound of it; and when we remember how many Jews died for England in the last war we must be brotherly with him and take his sorrows upon us.

But this is hardly relevant to the issue. For it is not the Jews who are joining with the Fascists to create disorder in North and East London. It is the Communists.

By a quite simple mechanism the Communists have heartlessly exploited the grievances of the Jews against the Fascists in order to create disorder under the Labour Government, to capture the Jewish vote in forthcoming Municipal and Parliamentary elections held in London, and to make general propaganda for their party.

Anybody who has had the time and the patience to make a series of visits during the last few weeks to the battlefields in Bethnal Green and Dalston must have recognised the tactics and strategy. At every Fascist meeting the crowd is packed with Communist interrupters, some Jewish, some not, who take up arranged positions so that when they can shout in chorus they achieve a massed effect, and are difficult to eject. They wear Communist badges and carry Communist literature, to make it quite plain what they are. Most of them are not resident in the districts where the meetings take place, and many come from well-to-do bourgeois homes.

They interrupt the Fascist speakers continuously, no matter what they are talking about, frequently by chanting the words, "Down with Fascism." Sometimes they rush the platform. Often they create such disorder that the police order the Fascists to close their meeting.

Few of us will shed real tears over this termination to their revels. But, unfortunately, it may be part of a humbugging programme which makes the gorge rise.

The Communists created such a disturbance at a Fascist meeting at one turning off Kingsland-road. The Fascists' angry supporters were then joined by a curious mob which attaches itself to them at such moments, though they never seem to listen to a speech. This consists of boys and girls between 16 and 20, adolescents who were children during the war and spent every night in the Underground, and now miss the excitement. These, singing and shouting about a Mosley whom none of them has ever seen, and occasionally letting off a firecracker, very naturally marched on a Communist meeting which was being held in another turning off Kingsland-road, under the false title of an "anti-Fascist" meeting, and tried to break it up.

The impression left on the simple population was expressed by a Jewish matron who had attended the Communist meeting because she lived in a street made miserable by Fascist oratory every Sunday evening. "What nice people the Communists are," she said. "When we were standing at that lovely meeting, and those horrible Fascist hooligans marched in, I just thought, Well, if one has to make a choice between Fascism and Communism I know which I would choose."

Everything I have said before is too weak, compared with what I saw yesterday. The feature of yesterday's meeting was that the demonstrators were not Jews but Communists. There were very few Jews present.

These riots have been coldly and deliberately manufactured: to persuade the electorate, quite falsely, that it is under a necessity to choose between Fascism and Communism.

My dear Ed.,

I have been long in writing you but wanted to give you a permanent address. I'm still without one but I think I will have one by Sept 29 when I will send you a postcard with it. We found the house too much for us and were luckily able to sell it taking our risks about getting another abode. For the last eight weeks we have been in furnished flats but I have now agreed to take with possession on the 29th a very nice unfurnished flat down at Folkestone with a small garden a hundred yards from the sea and with accomodation I think for my books. I haven't signed the lease yet so there are still possibiliites for slips between cup and lip but I hope there won't be. It's damned expensive but nice and easy to run.

AS far as I myself am concerned I have nothing to grumble at The wolf is being kept on the right side of the door quite successfully and I get more offers of work than I take. I find that the Glasgow Herald and Time and Tide between them provide a living and at no great effort leaving me time for reading and longer range writing. I'm toying with two book contracts at the moment but have not made up my mind. Also I've got an offer of part time work at the L.S.E. and there too I haven't made up my mind. Living at Folkestone will let me come up to town more easily and so oftener and as the Herald want me to be even more thoroughly their diplomatic correspondent than I am I may get them to pay half of a season ticket in which case travel becomes easy!

Of news I have little. I don't fail to go up to Columbia and see the boys. I haven't seen Howard for some time as he has been away but I like your Archie Jackson. The B.B.C. looks shabby and it's a saddening place. Every one looks so jaded and dispirited that I always feel indecently hale and hearty when I go in. Ryan has left - actually goes on Oct. 19 - to go to the Times and J.C.S. Macgregor succeeds. Ryan had no sooner handed in his resignation than he had a nervous breakdown. They are all ill with something. Poor old Michael had boils all over the body and Hollingworth is off with shingles. John Snagge had a month's sick leave and Lindsay alone of my old friends seems bearing up. Now that Ellen has gone, I hear little backstairs news but I think that when they have time the Cabinet will get rid of Hailey.

It's no news blinking the fact that all these illnesses and breakdowns are due less to working conditions than to lack of food. It gets steadily worse and I know now exactly what folks in prison say that they never are not hungry. I am in rude health and possibly the hungry feeling between meals is due to that as much as anything ~~el~~ else but under the easy conditions in which I live and with my temperament I have lost exactly twenty three pounds in twenty one months - to the horror of my tailor to whom I was finally driven last week. At my age you can well afford to lose that and possibly be the better of it but at Michael's age with all the work and worry he has you can't But out rulers who feed at the Grosvenor never think in these terms. What you are witnessing as you'll see when you come is the gradual extinction of the old middle-middle class Civilisation as we understand is doomed in Europe ; What follows may be better but it won't even begin to interest people like me. I sometimes look at my books and reflect sadly that in thirty years some of them may interest collectors but for their subjects will interest no one. I think that ere I die if I have time I'll do a ceremonial holocaust, except of course for the Civil War books.!! Talking of which if you ever meet a Senator ask him if thee are still copies of the Offical Records for supply to senators - 115 vols ?!

I think the best news I have had for months was hearing that you had resigned your vice-presidency (Note: I carefully put in a hyphen) and are going back to broadcasting. I am sure you are right for yourself and I'm more than sure that you are right for your countrymen. I hope you are getting a bit of a rest first before you take over for from what Elmer Davis says (whom to my great pleasure I saw when he was here) it seems to be a colossal job to produce even with shadows in the background ~~WW~~ a news broadcast every night. No one can do it better at the microphone than you - I thought that once again when I heard you a Sunday or two ago ; it wasn't one of your best but it was streets ~~ah~~ ahead of what we are accustomed to even now that the standard has gone up a little. Now that I'm settled I will try to help all I can. I am adding to this a short note of what is felt here Tell me if it is the sort of thing that is any help and also don't fail to ask if there is anything I can find out for you. And the best news of all which I take on Columbia's authority is that you and Janet are coming over here in Novemebef. It will be so good to see you both again. Give me plenty of warning for I don't fancy at all you will have time to come here so that I want to be prepared to come up to London where I can see you.

No more just now, except to send our love to all of you. I hear Casey flourishes like the greenest of baytrees. You haven't let him broadcast again have you ?

God bless you both and auf wiedersehen.

Thine
RT.

Poor old Jules is in a very bad way. After being treated for duodenal for years they finally found it was stone. After two operations which were quite successful he got a germ and last week they gave up hope but on the Friday (the 5th) he rallied and though he is nothing like out of danger there is hope. I'm just waiting to hear from Mrs Menken and if it is favourable I'll send you a postcard and later on you could drop him a line ; it would help him.

P.S J. has pulled thro' the still week - not out of danger The address is HOME. The Government has not yet lost hold of the electorate, that is to say, it has not yet created active hostility in those who voted for it in 1945 It has lost a large proportion of the floating vote and some of its own supporters have become apathetic but there is no wave against it. Analysis of the by-election figures show that with the present fall away they wouldn't lose more than ninety seats. At the same time the fall away has begun and if things go bad in the next months there might be a landslide away; it must be remembered though that here it takes about five years for disilusion to be translated at the polls. The danger point will come in three years time when people will vote not so much on the actual situation as on the accumulative effect of hardship etc. earlier.

NOTES

The odds are against a general election. For tactical reasons Herbert was against it on the ground that the country would think the government felt it needed another mandate The party was against it on similar grounds, but the fact that the losers will lose now £1000 per annum makes the resolve to stay the course not heroism but economic planning.

The split in the party becomes wider and the "fellow travellers" are much too active. They fail to pull their weight because the Left of the Left is disunited even more on motive than on policy. For instance the Crossman group are for a small army but they have just come out with a demand that if the U.N. ask we stay on in Palestine, thereby crossing the policy of the Zilliacus group which is to come out unconditionally. The real backer of the rebel Left which is wider than just "fellow travellers" is Nye Bevin who has been running a throughly treacherous policy. Having completely failed to justify his cabinet ministership he fancies himself as a leader of the ultra-pure and eventually becoming Prime Minister With him are Strachey and Shinwell two other failures ; they have made an issue on the immediate nationalisation of steel which Morrison and Cripps are against. At one point Nye's resignation was in Clem's hands ; at another Attlee had himself decided to resign (he's not in good health but then none of the real men are) It was only when Nye realised that he would have no support from the big boys, how could he when Ernie in Herbert's temporary withdrawal intends to be the next premier, that he withdrew and Attlee sure of Bevin, Cripps, Dalton and Morrison agreed to stay on. But they are an unhappy and divided team and that is the worst thing that could happen for the country. Almost any policy will do now if it is carried out vigorously and ably.

I don't think the cabinet reconstruction will go far ; it will probably be a reshuffle. I am told Ernie intends to stay on at the F.O until the November meeting is over. He anticipates a failure and will then resign to become organiser of the return to propserity, a role for which the abler Cripps isn't suited to ; no one likes him The people who ought to be dropped are the three rebels, Bellenger and one or two others but I doubt if Clem who is very feeble - even Herbert admits that - ~~won't~~ dare risk it There is also a dearth of good men to promote i.e. loyal men. It is the disloyalty that has soured Clem who now would prefer to have the evil he knows in the cabinet than outside it. A drastic purge might bring on an election but I don't think so. Tactically they ought to go the country, but defeat being just possible they won't as Socialist patriots risk it.

There is no denying that their best asset at the moment is Tory ineptitude The Tories have no policy they can recommend and the country knows it and knows also that a big Tory victory would probably produce a general strike. We are moving steadily to totalitarianism justified by an assimilation of this crisis to a war crisis and so far the Government has got away with it But they will have to justify it by success and that is another thing. Just because success is problematical they will extend totalitarianism even to the extent of trying to postpone an election on the ground that a change of policy would be fatal to the country.

The worst symptom is the apathy plus law-breaking and the cynicism. That may break them. Also there is the growing suspicion that in home and foreign politics there is a "sinister force" The demands for army cuts even on the Left is suspected as a move to leave us defenceless The Communist infiltration is serious and going very far ; even the universities are getting alarmed

FOREIGN.

The Government's own policy is no trouble abroad so that we can concentrate at home and so it is as a whole willing to overlook the fact that the trouble is there At the moment they have no foreign policy except a negative one.

There is the difficulty of doing the necessary retrenchment and yet not letting us drop to a second class power. One section of the Labour party is quite clear that we should admit we are a third-class one which for some reason they say is the foundation of an "independent foreign policy" and naturally the fellow travellers agree. Their function at home is to disrupt the national effort and make it impossible for us to have an independent policy vis à vis Russia. When you hear attacks on the U.S. don't forget there is this at the back of many. At the back of the others is sheer bewilderment and annoyance because of the failure of all the shibboleths. The fact is that we are dependent on the U.S. in the meantime for we can neither reorganise the Empire nor Western Europe in time to solve the immediate crisis. The Bevin arrival at the old Imperialist position is not the old one ; it is fundamentally, though Ernie isn't conscious of it, the cry of totalitarianism for Lebensraum to be autarchic in, which is why the Tory don't enthuse. You could build a Commonwealth on free trade but today it is not possible not because of U.S. opposition as is so often said here but because of economic nationalism. Naturally the pro-Russian element loses no chance of blaming the U.S. for our plight and it has had some success but the success is superficial. If trouble starts there will be certainly be trouble here but there will only be one answer to a Russian offer.

Bevin is under no illusions about Russia ; he feels he has failed completely and he isn't any the better-tempered because of it. But he is desperately afraid the crisis comes too soon, which is why the Marshall policy gets a guarded reception here. Most people regard it as right but they don't see the end, and all the pundits have already announced that Russia is unconquerable. The result is that our hands, though not really tied, are as good as tied. We have no positive policy and that is covered up by assertions that we can't afford a foreign policy until the crisis is over here. The fact is that with our own crisis there is no enthusiasm for any foreign remedy and there is no real interest taken either in Empire Free Trade or Western European union The supposed opposition of the U.S. to the former and of Russia to the latter creates hostility to both by a sort of reverse action Besides people here realise what their leaders don't tell them, that what we want is not production but buyers, and they don't see where they are to come from if the U.S. won't take them and the Dominions won't and the European countries can't For that situation there is no remedy in federations nor in Dominions which have a continued programme of industrialisation. What could do it is a vast subsidising of buying by the U.S. but naturally a U.S. subsidy, even if it was a gift, would insist on the custom going in the main to the U.S.

The fact is Europe is bust and there is no remedy until she admits she is bust and west of the Elbe we drop economic nationalism and form a unit and build a food economy inside it. But that is just a dream,

I don't think the trouble is really ~~imminent~~ imminent but if it came between U.S. and Russia the desire here for neutrality would be very great unless Russia attacked us ; a war in the Far East, the only place where Russia is vulnerable, would leave us cold.

The worst is the loss of faith No one really expects recovery and the government is no position to hold out a hope so concrete as to remove that impression.

DEFENCE

Serious cuts are coming and abandonment of world positions We are going back to 1930-34, The fight to save something will be more serious, Monty is said to have a scheme for modernising an army of 600,000 with the Territorials in second line, but that will take seven years during which we should be vulnerable. Both the Navy and the Air people are worried about giving up overseas bases which have to be defended as well as occupied. The Eastern Mediterranean is given up as a bad job ; we have India no longer which, as prophesied, is going to be a world liability ; and the lines of communication are now W. Africa, S. Africa E. Africa and nothing till you get to Singapore

ODDMENTS

The Fascist danger is negligible, The only danger is the Communist one and if it gets worse there might well be a Fascist reaction but it will be a Tory- Labour one, for Labour is now taking the place of the middle class. The next fight unless the Tories make a come-back is between a Centre ~~and~~ plus Left Centre and a Left which will grow redder and has leaders of ability once they decide that more and more Left ~~or~~ even to Leninism, is the profitable course The answer to that will be the Morrison-Bevin wing turning British again and to do that planning will have to go. The immediate danger, if we have a bad winter is a revolt of part of the planned ; it might have curious results.

I enclose a Dunkirk despatch as an example of excellent naval prose telling a good story in the old manner

Dear R.T.:

Your letter about Mr. Halcrow arrived in good time and I shall be very pleased to see him. I understand he will be coming in at the beginning of next week.

We are looking forward to receiving the long letter you promise with all your news and views.

My dear Ed,

I am in the middle of a long letter to Janet and you but I've got to interrupt it to fulfil a promise. Another colleague of mine is on a year's tour of the U.S. and I've given him a note to you - to be acted on only if you have the time and the inclination. I'm beginning to fear that he may have delivered the note before you get this!

His name is Morrison Halcrow and you'll find him a dour Scot without young Burnel's quick wit, but quite sound.

The letter to come contains my views of the situation (!) and what is happening to us. We've at last got a flat of our own and with a little luck should have it straight by Xmas. Things have been difficult of late professionally but all right domestically.

Our warm love to Janet, Casey and yourself

Yours as always

RT

P.S. Has Casey discovered the "Lays of Ancient Rome"? I discovered an educated and intelligent niece of mine who didn't know what or who "the ranks of Tuscany" were. Spare Casey that shame.

Dear RT,

First of all, I am sorry my last trip to London was so hectic we had no opportunity to meet. It now appears I shall be back around the end of October, when I must perpetrate a speech in Albert Hall /God help the audience/.

I won't bore you with a resume of the life of a bureaucrat or the change from poacher to gamekeeper. We can talk about all that when next we meet.

A recent note from Bob Trout tells me that you are considering dispersing your library. And that reminds me of conversations we had in more heroic days about your Civil War collection. As I recall it, you made some casual reference about leaving it to me in your will. Since you are likely to outlive me, this doesn't seem to be a happy prospect, so that I write to say that if you are in fact thinking of disposing of your library I would like to acquire the Civil War portion of it, and would be happy to pay whatever evaluation you, or a book dealer of your choice, might place upon it. This is no sentimental gesture for I hope one day to have time to read, and I also have a son who fortunately has both the ability and the aptitude to read books.

Do let me hear from you at your earliest convenience because if the stock market continues to behave as it is, I might be obliged to withdraw the offer and return to North Carolina and haul cotton on what remains of the ancestoral acres.

As ever,

Yours,

Dear Ed,

The other day I received a letter from RT Clark about our customary annual meeting in London, which I expected this year would take place in July. However, he writes that, unfortunately, he may not be in London, as around that time he must go to Folkestone to dispose of five tons of books that he has in storage there.

As RT says that he doesn't know what you will say, for he promised to leave his Civil War books to you in his will, I am taking the liberty of writing to you about him and his situation. His letter was fairly gloomy. He is, he points out, getting no younger, work is harder to get and takes longer to do, the cost of living is rising, and so he is forced to sell all his books and try to find a cheaper place to live, in the country if he cannot find one in London.

Kit and I are caught up in the details of preparing to sail to Europe for three months so, instead of waiting until I have time to try to think this through, I am sending you this quick note before we leave.

Best, as ever,

Bob

ADDRESS OF RT CLARK:
39 Esmond Gardens - London, W. 4
or:
c/o The Glasgow Herald - 56 Fleet St., London E. C. 4, England

Fleet St. Sunday night (Clark) No P. Earlier letter attached

My dear Ed.,

I meant to write rightaway to say how delightful it was not just to hear your voice but to hear it so vigorous and so untired I daresay you will assert that it was really very tired but honestly it was evidence that your holiday had done you good and I was delighted to hear that at last you did take a real holiday and actually fished It may be of course that in those parts fishing is as strenuous an exercise as on a Scottish burn but I prefer to think of you doing the English way sitting with your back against a tree not encouraging the fish but merely waiting for it Did you catch anything by the way ?

I guessed the identity of "the friend" quite wrongly I didn't know J.C. was in the U.S. and I had just taken leave of Elmer Davis a day or two ago and he said he would probably be in New Yprk so I concluded it was he looking in on you. I had an evening with him on his return from Scandinavia where he appeared to have done as much broadcasting and rather more work than he does in Washington ; that is the way you lads take holidays.

Well it has come, I gathered you knew of it as soon as we did — sooner if some folks are to be believed I hoped Herbert would be seeing you and tell you that the decision was taken to have it whenever it was clear that there wasn't to be "a great victory" for him and Gaitskell in the U.S. It took the party very much by surprise and it has temporarily at least torpedoed Aneurin who got his silly pamphlet out the day the decision was announced and put nearly all the T.U.C. leaders dead against him.

He is now appealing for unity on a progressive programme but I don't think he will press it Attlee however may force him to pronounce and nothing he can say can do him any good The little man is not unclever, you know. I think he will resign if he is beaten and go to the Lords ; he has just laid in five tons of coal in his country cottage !!

This time

I'm sorry for Herbert for if they could have brought something back from the U.S. he could have had hopes of winning and then he could have got rid of the F.O. I'll tell you more about that when I see you ; it isn't for a mailed letter. Now he will have to go on if they win

On the result-I think personally it is more open than it looks The betting is on a Tory majority of 30-40 on a minimum and there have been quite a number of bettors on 100. There are five weeks to go and anything may happen ere then ; one thing is certain if the Russians move the Tories are well in I'd give you two possibilities apart from the possibility of there being little change ; if the Labour boys win as a result of something happening they might have 20 majority but not more. One is that there will be a small turnover of the floating vote in which case 50 is as much as the Tories can hope for. But if the genuine discontent in the country takes the form of voting agin the government irrespective of party then there might well be a landslide. For instance every busman I've met says he is voting Tory and quite a number of the still houseless say the same. You remember in 1945 the vote was against the Tory majority in favour of a change ; the same sort of feeling might operate now.

At the moment the country is more anxious about the King than anything else now that the lawyers have decided that even a royal death would not affect the elections The operation today was successful in the sense that the patient is still alive but I gather that the trouble is carcinoma of one lung and that is serious but not necessarily fatal He will be out of action for a good time at the best. The diagnosis is only one by knowledgeable people, but we know nothing official and there are equally knowledgeable people who declare that the condition is the result of T.B.

When are you coming ? If I might suggest come for a fortnight and really do the elections. They are decried as unimportant, but actually they are the most important for a long time for theywill affect the future not only of this country but of the whole international situation If the Labour boys come back the drift to state socialism will continue and it will be increasingly difficult to maintain the present relations either with the U.S. or the Continent If the Tories do we shall quickly face a situation in which orgainsed Labour will revolt It might do whoever was in for we face a very hard winter but the revolt against a Tory government which can't really make that situation better this winter will be political as well. Besides you ought to see the provinces where the result will be decided. London will swing right but there is no guarantee the country will. You ought to vist Birmingham Manchester (where Salford has always been a key constituency ; if the results begin with two Tory gains there it is a landslide) Newcastle Glasgow and you can broadcast from each If you do I'll come to Glasgow with you and we'll inflict ourselves on the editor of the Glasgow Herald. Seriously do try and take a fortnight It certainly isn't for your health for it will be hard work but I think it would genuinely repay you Actually the election comes at an awkward time politically and domestically No one knows what precisely happens if the King should die but I gather that all that can happen is that the old Parliament would be recalled to be dissolved again by the new monarch. Even that is uncertain but the election will certainly be held. The only worry is whether between now and Oct.25 Stalin will perpetrate a "crisis" You remember it was Hitler s technique to have a crisis when the French hadn't a government and if was the British weekend ; the old gentleman who has studied Hitler more than we have might think it worth the risk. If it was a genuine crisis we might be in a very ticklish situation. I gather that here the confidence that "Russia will do nothing dirty" is firm.

There is no news for all the issues while as topical - inflation, high prices, the pressure of rearmament, shortages of materials - are in abeyance until after the 25th. God knows how any successful party will tackle them. The only thing is that with every one convinced this will be the worst winter it may not be actually so bad as was anticipated. Things are undoubtedly difficult but they affect different people in different ways and any remedy is going to hit some sections mighty hard It is that that makes the result doubtful.

Well that's the lot except to say how much I am looking forward to seeing you. Do we have the happiness of seeing Janet too ? I don't suppose you will bring Casey Please give our love to both of them and with all thebest to yourself

My dear Ed.,

If you blame yourself for being a bad correspondent what must you think of me ? It is only now that I've got down to give you a letter as well as thanks for the noble parcel of books. If I had thought I was going to be held up so long in writing a real letter I'd have written a short one just to enquire after you and to thank you. I was most worried by a report from Denis Brogan which, allowing for ~~the~~ all the exaggerations with which Denis adorns the plainest of tales, did indicate that you had had a bad time with shingles. Then I heard from Hallam Street that you had "had" to go off on a brief holiday and as I know what your idea of a holiday is that didn't relieve my anxiety.

How are you really ? I regard your schedule with complete awe. How you hold up under it I don't know I hope that you have quite got over the shingles and that you are really able to tackle all you are doing but I wish you could take a real rest. I still hear rumours that you may be here at the beginning of the month but there is not the slightest confirmation in Hallam Street so I don't know whether to expect you or not. If you had come in the middle of this month you would have had to take things easy for every one was away but I greatly fear that they will all be back, except probably Winston, by the first week in September.

I've been more than ordinarily busy and life is made the more complicated as we still have been unable to get a flat that suits us and is at the same time economically possible. We are still in a furnished one which is expensive and difficult, for you can't get your things round you and work is thus made trebly difficult. I'm under contract to produce two books and never seem able to get down to them partly because there is so much else to do and partly because it is hard to work where we are.

This being the holiday season a certain amount of time has gone on visitors of one kind or another. Some old American friends have been over and some new ones and these visits I did enjoy, not least because I basked in reflected glory as an old friend of yours. They all seem to listen to you regularly and with complete acceptance. Judging from what one lot said you influence opinion in California which I gather is a Tory stronghold very considerably. More power to you!

This is a bad time for liberal doctrines which are being questioned very much as was Christianity in my young days In both cases the scientists contributed their quota and they do not help by ~~now~~ confessing that what they regarded almost as revealed truth is now all in the melting pot again with no one prepared to say what will at last come out. I saw totalitarianism which we then called Fascism among young scientists before 1939 ; now the opposite totalitarianism is gaining ground. It is a strange reversal to hear a scientist defending Dachau as a necessary safeguard to state progress!! The Bible says that you don't get grapes from thistles but thistles are productive compared to the political scientists, the logical postivists and the psychologists.

There is little to tell you that you won't know already. There may be an election in the last week of October, at once the latest and earliest date likely to help the Government But I don't think there will be-unless i. there is a real split in the party and Nye daren't split it, or ii there is a succession of good happenings like peace in Korea, a settlement with Persia, the beginning of negotiations with Russia to which all the credulous cling and a fall in prices. It is the price issue that will do them down unless there is something to offset it in the sense that the Government can say that the international situation has been restored so well that prices will inevitably come down before the winter. As it is, any Government that goes to the country with nothing but "peace" for a policy and a programme of dearer and less food, more power cuts, less heating, no more houses and increased rents is bound to get beaten even if all this happens under its successor.

The vote will not be one for the Tories and against Labour No one expects more from the former than they have had from the latter and that very circumstance by contrariety makes a big anti-Government vote certain for the voters will vote for a change. The argument for an Oct. election is that the defeat in spring will be heavier for the international situation won't get better and that the inevitable winter hardship will be blamed on the Tories. The argument against is that it would be unwise to go out in case something happens that would have helped the government and now would establish the Tories. Nye's view has always been: Let the Tories take the burden of the next hard years and at the end they will be out for a generation - a dangerous and doubtful argument but typically Welsh

The decisive factor is I think Attlee. If his health fails again, he will probably resign and let the deluge come. If it doesn't I think he will remember his divine mission to keep the Tories out as long as possible. I think that, if well, he would feel it a cowardly dereliction of duty to go to the country except on the assurance that he would get back, and he would be prepared to risk permanent damage to the health of all the members by carrying on for the full term in the present circumstances rather than give the Tories a lease of power.

But there is a lot of "perhaps" about all that for actually none can say what will happen. I asked an old friend of mine in the Treasury who is one of those most responsible for making policy and he said quite quietly "There is no solution to the present difficulties ; we have just to count on their being resolved or shelved by something unexpected" That reminded me of Chicot the Jester in "The Fifty Five Guardsmen" "Chance ? Chance is God's reserves".

Actually this whole unbelieving world sits waiting for divine intervention; the reality of the situation but a reality of which the politicians can take no advantage.

What has impressed me most is the rapidity with which the ministers are ageing and the failure of health resulting in a failure of will. They are thin harrassed nervy and losing their grip. You can see it in Patrick Gordon Walker over Bechuanaland and Patrick is still a stronger character than most. You see it in Herbert, whose three big speeches two were frightful and who simply doesn't know where he is. He pronounced "Euphrates" in the House to rhyme with "plates" and when some people said "Oh Oh" lost his temper as if he were still in the lower fifth.

You saw Rainwell's exhibition in the U.S. a successor to a couple of worse ones here and Manny is still a shrewd little Jew. There is no policy and so alternate tears of disullusion and howls of rage. I hope when the howls become anti-American you don't take too much notice over there, but as your politicians seem to have just as gruelling a time their nerves are probably not much better.

There is no genuine anti-Americnism here except from the Communists and their followers and the odd grumble that always exists in families who get on better when their members are kept apart. It is very ~~annoying~~ annoying for every little incident gets prominence first by the attack on the U.S. and then by the necessity to defend the U.S. ; the case of the stopping of the boys going to Berlin was typical. Luckily the indignation that was worked up is dying down but a residue remains. I think you will find a certain anti-Americanism among your old government friends which is due less to the pressure which they do resent, than to the knowledge that if they had done their duty by their country the pressure would not have been applied because it could have been resisted. The government is now showing a mental dishonesty that, knowing the people, I would not have accepted as possible in 1945.

And so we struggle on with scare headlines and cartoons about the lion's tail being twisted even by Egyptians and Persians, while the vast bulk of the voters do not care tuppence since all their tuppences go to meet the increased cost of necessities. The situation is too ~~complicate~~ complicated to grasp and the only thing that is more unintelligible than the situation are the explanations of it by the experts and the intelligentsia.

But enough of this. We will talk it out if and when you come. Meantime let just affection be added to you to Janet and to Casey ; the latter two we do hope are well and happy.

Excuse the incoherence of this but I am trying to get it off before I go to a conference at which that slimy creature Krishna Menon will expla: explain why Nehru can't sign the Jap treaty.

God bless you and thanks again for the books I'll send you the Bradley review when it appears I met him here and he impressed even more than the book did. As history it won't stand in its entirety, but with your verdict as the best book from a combat post I entirely agree It is the only memoirs book that has reminded me steadily of the memoirs of the Civil War veterans

Dear Frank:

I trust that the assignment in Cyprus is proving altogether agreeable. I shall likely be passing through there sometime during the course of the coming year and we must, by all means, arrange a rendezvous.

As I wrote you some time ago, I see no immediate prospect of undertaking the ventures you outlined but, who knows, perhaps in a few years from now, we may both have the energy and the opportunity to try something on our own.

So far as our elections are concerned, I have never had less difficulty with any personal or emotional involvement. At this point, I am inclined to agree with those who say neither man can win.

I am presently engaged in trying to make my own small contribution by trying to arrange a television debate between Adlai Stevenson and Tom Dewey. Both candidates will be packaged, processed, and polished by the Madison Avenue boys, and I have no doubt we shall get what we deserve.

As ever yours,

Cyprus,

23rd. August, 1960

Dear Ed,

I should have written before to say that, having accepted an invitation to return to the U.K. Government Service, I had had to drop all outside ventures, including those in TV, and would in any event therefore no longer be available for the sort of co-operation I raised in earlier letters.

I trust that you may, perhaps, care on your own, to pursue some of the ideas I raised.

I am pretty sure that there are big possibilities coming up, in the U.K. the Overseas Commonwealth and elsewhere, as the U.K. comes to license a second commercial TV service (and also commercial sound radio), as commercial sound radio and television services spread through what were until recently the colonial empires of England, France, Belgium etc., and as the rising standards of literacy and wealth in the Middle East, Africa and Asia make these markets of greater interest to those who advertise on radio or tv.

I would like to see someone with your combination of qualities playing a major role in all this, and as an entrepreneur and not just either a salaried Vice-President or contracted commentator. And I would particularly like to see a U.K., U.S., Overseas Commonwealth, consortium in some areas instead of just rivalries between C.B.S., N.B.C. etc. on your side, and Assoc. Re-Diffusion, A.T.V., Granada etc. in the U.K.

I believe that some of those with whom I was in touch, Christopher Chancellor of Odhams, Edward Lewis of Decca, Patrick Gibson of the Cowdray Trust, Lord Colyton, John Foster, Graham Spry etc. would welcome co-operation with you.

Also I am sure that your own newspaper column would go well.

And that you would find the Channel Islands, should you venture into international efforts, offering you valuble tax advantages.

But I fear I cannot myself, at least for some years, be involved in such matters.

I can imagine that you have had, and will be having, a most hectic time. I suppose it is a sign of age but I cannot feel that the choice between Richard Nixon and Jack Kennedy really offers theUSA (and the free world, whose leader, whether the rest of us like it or not, is whoever Americans may chose to be their President) the best available choice, or a choice equal to those of 1940 (Roosevelt & Willkie), 1944 (Roosevelt and Dewey), 1948 (Truman and Dewey), 1952 or 1956 (Eisenhower and Stevenson). As regards Jack Kennedy I cannot understand why, with two terms now a constitutional limit, anyone should seek the Presidency at an age which might make him an ex-President at 52 instead of using his forties to acquire additional experience for the greatest job on earth. But you will certainly have a lively campaign, and the rest of us will certainly experience a big change, whichever young candidate wins.

Cyprus is very peaceful. Very little interest really, locally, so far in the new Republic, the Greeks disappointed both that they have not got Enosis and that the Turks have gained such big advantages, and the Turks more excited really at their minority rights, and their Turkish garrison, than by Independence. So far many more Greek and Turkish, especially Turkish, flags on view than Cyprus ones.

The President, Abp. Makarios, is a fascinating figure, who will, I think, create quite a lot of interest if and when he plays a part at U.N., Commonwealth Prime Ministers Conference (should Cyprus join the Commonwealth) etc.

I hope, perhaps we may see you and Janeth here sometime, when en route to or from the Middle or Far East or Africa (Nicosia is centrally placed in the air age). If you came in Feb or Mar. you could, any day, devote the morning to skiing and the afternoon to swimming, the mountains, 50miles away, having snow whilst the sea, 16 miles away, is already well over 60.

Best wishes to Janet and yourself,
Yours ever,

Dear Frank:

This is a belated answer to yours of June 22. The fact of the matter is that I have not been in my office since returning to this country in late April, having been travelling here, and to Berlin, and more recently to the two political conventions.

I have studied your stimulating and talented suggestions but, for the time being at least, there is no possibility of my undertaking this, the reason being that, for the coming year, I am committed to more production here at CBS than I can possibly supervise or control. The position a year from now may be different but, for the time being, I have no alternative but to concentrate on the tasks to which I am committed.

Please forgive the delay in answering, and convey our best to Dorothy.

22nd. June, 1960.

Dear Ed,

I attach 4 papers which will, I hope interest you.

The mimeographed one is a paper which I have been discussing confidentially recently with people here like Sir Christopher Chancellor (Chairman of Odhams Press Ltd., publishers of "The Daily Herald" etc.), Mr. E.R. Lewis (Chairman of Decca), Mr. A.P. Gibson (Managing Director, Westminster Press, and TV adviser to Lord Cowdray); Mr. William Aitken M.P. (General Manager, Express Features Service); Lord Hampden (Managing Director of Lazards); Mr. Edward Norman-Butler (London Chief General Manager of Martins Bank); John Foster Q.C. M.P. (a fommer Parl. Sec. to the Commonwealth Relations Office, who is, inter alia, a legal adviser to the Suez Finance Co. - succesors to the old Canal Co.), Graham Spry (Agent-General for Saskatchewan who has extensive radio and television experience and contacts in Canada). The 3 others are prepared especially for you, and have gone, and will go to noone else, although I have discussed with Leonard Miall, Jo. Harsch, Richard Goold Adams and William Clark the international television discussion programme idea, to link Washington, Paris and London (Leonard thinks BBC can only consider this when it has a 2nd. TV programme, the other 3 were more excited, and all said that it was the sort of programme they would love to take part in.)

Frankly I much hope that you willbbe prepared to buy these ideas from me, and also such services as I might render you personally, in these connections, or in any others in which you think, from time to time, I could serve you.

I do not have the capital to exploit such ideas adequately, and in any event your name would enable you to do so more effectively than I could. I could also do more acting for you, than acting for myself.

On the capital score I found, when making a good though unsuccessful run for the Channel Islands programme contract of the ITA, which we lost mainly, I think, because I could not swing enough cash at the right time, that good ideas, hard work, contacts in the right quarters etc. are not enough. One must have oneself, or be able to command at a moments notice, not just enough money for a given project to make it go, but reserve to mobilise at critical moments, in response the opposition moves etc.

Channel Islands Television Limited remains in being, perhaps to bid for a commercial sound radio contract if and when this medium can in the British Isles be used commercially, to bid for the second ITA contract in the CI if and when competitive ITV is authorised, or to seek contracts elsewhere (I was working with Roy Thomson of Scottish, David Wilson of Southern, Anthony Jelly of Tyne-Tees etc. lasy month on a Malta opportunity but in the end we decided not to bid.) Despite my wish to resign I have been asked by the Col to remain Chairman at least for the time being. But I shall, I think, now be much less than hitherto in the CI.

The failure of our bid, has, however, left me strapped financially. Hence my hope to sell these ideas to you, and also my services part-time, rather than try to exploit the ideas to my own financial benefit.

I attach on another sheet my financial suggestion.

Please let me have your re-actions urgently.

Best wishes to Janet and yourself, and hoping that you both and Casey are well,

Yours ever,

Strictly Confidential

Proposal

That a syndicate should now be formed to:-

1. Commission studies of the areas in which and terms on which worth while contracts in the fields of commercial television and/or sound radio are likely to become available during the next few years :-

   a) In the United Kingdom

   b) In the Overseas Commonwealth

   c) In other parts of the world where U.K. applicants might, if in association with local people of influence, have a fair chance of success.

2. Draw up a list of possibilities worth at the least even more detailed study.

3. As regards those contracts deemed to be:-

   (a) Very well worth securing

   b) Possibly attainable if sought in the right way,

   Prepare detailed plans of campaign.

4. Inspire in the chosen areas the formation of local syndicates (in which the main syndicate would have an important stake) or where this seems preferable seek to buy into good local syndicates already existing with a view to having, at the relevant times, a really good starter for each chosen contract.

5. At the appropriate time mobilise all available resources behind the syndicate's candidate for each chosen contract.

6. Insofar as this seems legitimate and advisable seek to influence the trend of opinion, official, legislative and other, in the hope that the terms on which contracts will be granted will be such as to fit the needs of the decade 1964-1974.

7. Explore the needs which would arise, assuming two competing commercial television networks in the U.K., perhaps a "Pay as you View" service in some areas, perhaps commercial sound radio, and a rapid multiplication of the number of commercial television services in the Overseas Commonwealth and elsewhere, for a more ample, and per television or radio set more cheap, and cheaper to handle, supply of programmes whether live (for populous areas, where the population is wealthy and reasonably well concentrated) or taped or filmed, (for the overseas market).

8. If this seemed to offer the possibilities of long term profit form companies to supply such needs, whether to the syndicate's own television or sound radio companies (if and when it secures contracts) or to others (even should the syndicate secure no worth while contract for itself).

NOTE:

To concentrate wholly on the pursuit of one contract is like buying one yearling, training and entering him for one race, and facing a dead loss should he not prove suited to that race even though he might have won other races. The prudent owner has a string of horses and whilst he may hope to win the Derby may still go down as successful if amongst a number of horses which have never won anything he has a few successful in races much less glamorous and profitable than the Derby.

Conditions in the decade 1964-1974 will be so different from those now obtaining that much advanced, detailed study is needed in order wisely to decide where, when and at what price to bid, and to be ready if successful to operate to maximum profit.

TELEVISION AND RADIO, 1960 to 1970.

1. Although no decisions have yet been reached in the United Kingdom (indeed the necessary Government Committee has not yet been appointed) it is already a safe assumption in view of the popularity of commercial television, the pressure of advertisers for a competitive medium of advertisements on television, and for some opportunity to advertise locally on sound radio in the U.K., and the regional and local interests able to bring pressure upon Ministers and M.P.s, that, when the B.B.C. Charter and I.T.A. Act come to be renewed, there will be another commercial TV network (also, probably, a second BBC TV service), provision for commercial sound broadcasting, and opportunity for "Pay as you view" TV. Those who make the first and best studies, assemble the best syndicates, and prepare the best bids, stand to make fortunes, less than those won by A.R.D., A.T.V., Granada and A.B.C. in round one of commercial TV in the U.K. but none the less well worth having.
2. France is almost certain, within the next few years, to fall in line with other countries and provide opportunity for commercial TV.
3. The number of TV contracts in the overseas countries, members of the Commonwealth, the French Community etc., or wholly distinct from London or Paris, will also multiply during the next decade, and also, in many cases, what are initially loss-making rather than profit-making contracts will, with the rise in African and Asian standards of living become profitable.
4. The older parts of the Commonwealth, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, may also provide further radio and/or television oppprtunities, as the possibility technically of additional services developes, and as population and wealth increase.
5. With many more sound radio and television programmes needed, and networking being so much cheaper than trying to orginate more than a small proportion of ones own programmes, and with technical developments certain to extend the ranges over which live international television hook-ups can be achieved, an immense growth in the international exchange of programmes also seems certain.
   With or without a radio or television contract those abbe, from an early stage, to supply new sound radio and/or televisin programme companies with useable material, cheaper or better than the existing semi-monopolies provide, may also make fortunes.
6. There is no reason why the existing majors in this business, N.B.C. and C.B.S. in U.S.A., A.RD and A.T.V. and Granada in the U.K., should continue to get most of the cream from this expanding supply. But they will do so if others do not prepare their plans quickly and well.
7. The ideal arrangement, having regard to the inter-dependence in so many fields, and notably of this one, of North America, the U.K. and mainland Europe, and the territories elsewhere with special historic, political, economic and/or cultural links with N.A., U.K or mainland Europe, would be syndicates with U.S., U.K., French and/or German, and overseas, elements, jointly pommissioning surveys and making plans, setting up local companies when opportunities arise to bid for worth while contracts, and when contracts are secured acting in unison in the matter of programmes worth jointly commissioning, and jointly selling. In each area local companies should be genuinely local, but all would gain by some networking etc. arrangements between them on an international scale.
8. A radio and television syndicate with bases in North America, the U.K. and France, and links with groups elsewhere, would be in an enormously strong position, both to secure good contracts (through appropriate local companies) and to supply, or arrange for the exchange of, programmes on the widest international scale, with all the economies which should result therefrom.

9. Already some people, aware of the possibilities, are preparing to exploit them, but for the most part these are companies already in the business. Those not in, or in in capacities which do not allow them full scope to share in capital gains, who think that there is no need for hurry (because in the U.K. B.B.C. Charter lasts till 1962 and I.T.A. Act until 1964) may find they have made a mistake, and that when they do become active there is too much lee way to make up, others having entrenched themselves in the best fields earlier.

TELEVISION PROGRAMME FOR INTERNATIONAL DISTRIBUTION.

1. Despite the clamant need, in the field of international affairs, for a better integrated western point of view, and policies, both as regards the internal development of the Free World and its relations with the Communist World, little is as yet being done to achieve integration in the field of press, radio or television, magazines, newspapers and radio and television companies, in U.S.A., Canada, the U.K., and mainland Europe, all operating on their own, buying one another's material but seldom if ever jointly planning and producing and using something which has from start to finish been neither American, British or European but the joint effort of all three.
2. If the companies will not seize this opportunity then individuals might do so. Leading commentators and/or columnists, North American, U.K. and European, might jointly prepare, produce and market genuinely international television programmes on tape or film.
3. The precise types of internationally planned, produced and marketed programmes, in the field of news and current events, which would sell best, be most practicable, and subject to these limitations be most worth while, would require working out in detail. A few leading figures in the field, like Ed Murrow in USA, Richard Goold Adams nor William Clark in the U.K., Raymond Aron in France, could, if they put their collective minds to it, soon evolve programmes adjusted to the possibilities and needs.
4. One possibility which they might care to explore (but there are many others) might be for a programme along the following lines:-
   a. Small, representative groups in Washington, Paris and London (and less frequently other capitals) including foreigners resident in these capitals as well as local people of importance, to meet together for a frank, full, quasi off-the-record discussion, over a leisurely meal and sometimes over a 24 hour period (modelling themselves, to some extent, on Prince Bernhard's Bilderberg series of Conferences). These sessions not to be taped or filmed, and to include more people than would appear on the actual programme.
   b. From those attending such discussions a panel, after the larger group has adjourned, to engage in a live discussion before the cameras (sometimes perhaps interviewing jointly a major international personality, other times an expert, other times exchanges news and views amongst themselves). In order to enable programmes to be sold in French-speaking and German-speaking as well as English-speaking countries, 3 panels to be constituted in each capital from each discussion group, one in each of the 3 languages.
   c. So soon as tapes or films are ready copies to be taken by participants in Washington, Paris and London to the other capitals.
   d. So soon as Washington, Paris and London each have copies of the tapes or film from the other capitals, (and also spokesmen for each of the 3 panels), each to make a composite programme, marrying and cutting the 3 tapes or films, and where useful interjecting live items from the participants present who have come hot foot from the 3 panels,
   e. Washington, Paris and London (whose programmes, although all based on the same raw material would not be identical, the editing process having produced different results in the 3 capitals, attuned to their respective viewers) then to use the resulting programmes themselves, and each to seek to market copies of its version in agreed other markets.
   f. Costs to be shared, and also profits from sale of copies to other markets.

INTER-CONTINENTAL COMMENTARY.

1. Whether or not continuing to remain under contract to a broadcasting company, and to give priority to personal appearances on the air, it would pay Edward R. Murrow to launch a newspaper column, capable of being marketed in a number of languages and countries. This would greatly extend his audience and influence, newspaper copy being more easily moved across oceans and linguistic barriers than radio or television programmes. It would also provide a continuing means of influence and source of income, much more independent of outside influences, than any radio or television programme can be, available should Edward R. Murrow ever wish to reduce or eliminate his radio and TV appearances, or transfer his efforts at any rate partially from the front of the cameras to the back (where, perhaps, there may be more opportunity long-term of capital gains).
2. Initially, perhaps, such a column might appear weekly, in the U.K., perhaps, in "The Sunday Times", "The Observer" or the new Sunday paper shortly to be launched, "The Sunday Telegraph"; and in equivalent newspapers in other countries.
3. It might strike a new note, and serve an especially useful purpose, if, whilst primarily E. Murrow's column, it took the form of an exchange of news and views between him and European, U.K., and other colleagues, Murrow appearing always, some of his colleagues in other continents to his frequently, some brought in for a particular occasion only.
4. Inter-continental telephone conversations prior to any of the participants writing their contributions for the "Inter-Continental Commentary", to make sure that each was dealing with the topics currently of interest to the others, and that there was some coherence to the contributions as a whole, would be important. So, of course, would be the overall editing done under Ed Murrow's supervision wherever he might be that particular week.

Edward R. Murrow agrees to buy, and Frank Darvall agrees to sell, for a payment of twelve thousand dollars ($12,000), payable in quarterly installments of three thousand dollars ($3,000) in July and October, 1960 and January and April, 1961, to Frank Darvall's account at Lloyds Bank, St. Helier, Jersey, Channel Islands,

1. The ideas contained in the enclosures to Frank Darvall's letter of 22nd. June, 1960 to Edward R. Murrow, any financial benefit which may result from following these ideas up to be thenceforward, as between Frank Darvall and Edward R. Murrow, exclusively for Edward R. Murrow.

2. Frank Darvall's services, if as and when requested by Edward R. Murrow, as a European consultant and/or representative for Edward R. Murrow, anytime that Mr. Murrow shall seek Mr. Darvall's advice and help, whether in connection with the matters raised in Mr. Darvall's letter of 22nd. June, 1960, and/or the enclosures thereto, or otherwise, anytime between receipt by Mr. Darvall of the first installment of the payment referred to in the opening paragraph above, and four calendar years thereafter.

Should Edward R. Murrow find, at the end of these four calendar years, that none of the ideas in Frank Darvall's letter of 2nnd. June, 1960, and/or the enclosures thereto, have been followed up, to Edward R. Murrow's financial advantage to the extent of the sum paid in 1960-1961 by Mr. Murrow to Mr. Darvall, Mr. Murrow to be entitled to treat the payments as a loan rather than a purchase price, and to request Mr. Darvall to repay the difference between $12,000 and Mr. Murrow's actual financial return, 1960-1964, from the following up of the said ideas, and/or from any other advice and help Frank Darvall may have given to Edward R. Murrow between July, 1960 and July, 1964.

Dear Ed:

I understand perfectly why you prefer not to sign the open letter to the President, and agree that there would be a certain redundancy in your subscribing to views which you have already expressed so often and so well and which, I trust, you will be in a position to express in the same way for a long time to come.

No "big angel" has descended, and while we are not without prospect of a visitation, any financial wing-fluttering you might feel inclined to do would certainly help to get the project air-borne.

Davis, Elmer

December 7, 1956

Dear Elmer:

Sorry to have delayed in answering your letter of November 30th. I find little, if anything, in the proposed statement with which I disagree; and indeed have expressed many of the same facts on the air already.

Since I have, for the time being at least, adequate opportunity for expressing my views, I have felt it wise to follow the policy of not signing public statements of any kind, no matter how much I have agreed with them.

Despite this decision, which I am sure you will understand, if it comes to the question of an ad in the "Times" and a "big angel" cannot be found, it would pleasure me to flutter a small financial wing in the venture.

I send you my best salute, as always.

ELMER DAVIS

November 30, 1956

Dear Ed:

I am taking the liberty of inviting you to read the enclosed draft of what is intended to be an open letter to the President of the United States, setting forth the views of leaders in the world of arts and letters in favor of American support for a peace settlement in the Middle East by direct negotiation between the Arab States and Israel.

It seems to me that at this critical juncture in world affairs, the views of people like yourself, precisely because they have not often been given expression, could have an important effect on American policy.

This is particularly imperative at a moment when American policy is floundering and there is the greatest danger of new appeasements which, by delaying peace, will advance the Russian penetration of the Middle East.

I am enclosing a list of persons who, together with you, have been invited to sign this letter. I would be most grateful if I could have your immediate word authorizing us to include your name. The enclosed card is for your convenience.

When we have received enough signatures, we propose to send the letter to the President and subsequently to publicize it in the press and on the air; and even, possibly, to place it as an advertisement in The New York Times, if an angel can be found.

Sincerely yours,

Elmer Davis

PROPOSED OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. President:

When are we going to face up to the central danger — Russia's presence in the Middle East -- with her arms, her technicians, her propagandists, her spies, her diplomats -- and her threats?

Abdul Gamal Nasser, Egypt's dictator, put Russia there. Not Israel, not Britain, not France. They only served to expose the dimensions of the Russian penetration. This expose has won for them the opprobrium of the U.N., the label of aggressor. For Nasser it has won the halo of purity and of martyrdom. We have helped to place it on his head.

Have we forgotten the record?

That Egypt, by its own proclamation to the Security Council, launched a war against the U.N. Partition Resolution authorizing the establishment of the State of Israel.

That for eight years Egypt has been warring against the Armistice Agreements. Indeed, Egypt told the Security Council through its Foreign Minister: "The Egyptian-Israel General Armistice Agreement will not be interpreted by us as terminating in any legal or technical sense the state of war between Egypt and Israel."

That for eight years Egypt and the Arab States have sought to avenge themselves for their defeat in the Palestine War. Vengeance sought not because Israel takes from any established Arab State one inch of territory. Vengeance sought out of vanity -- vanity stimulated by the appeasement policy of the West which hoped for alliances, military and political, which have never been established, while the price of the courtship grew with each year.

That since 1951, Egypt has been in defiance of the Security Council Resolution ordering it to end its ban on Israel shipping through the Suez Canal.

That it has consistently sought, in concert with other Arab States, to bring about the economic strangulation of Israel through boycott.

That without cessation Israel has been exposed to remorseless attacks on its frontiers and to the unending terror of the sudden swoop of the marauder and the murderer.

That only a few months ago, Egypt, Syria, Yemen, Jordan and Saudi Arabia solemnized military pacts, the avowed purpose of which was joint action for the destruction of Israel.

Yet never has Egypt been labeled "aggressor," still less called to account. Not even when Egypt seized the Suez Canal Company in defiance of international treaty, thereby imperiling the lifeline of Britain and France and countless other nations, large and small, made dependent upon the dictator's whim for the freedom of this short route to Europe, Africa and Asia.

That record is important in order to assess the present danger and our future course.

Shall we now reward the dictator who sold out the hopes of the improverished Egyptian masses to the Russians in return for arms? Shall we further entrench in power the man who preaches violent revolt across the African Continent? Shall we support the trouble-maker who calls us imperialists; incites the Moslem world against the Christian faith; sends agents, arms, and funds throughout Africa and the Middle East to consolidate his dream of empire and push out every vestige of Western influence?

Have we forgotten so soon the record of Nasser's deceit and betrayal of the West?

His violation of the assurances given in return for U.S. help in persuading the British to evacuate their Suez base.

His sabotage through his puppet, Syria, of the U.S. plan for development of the Jordan Valley for the benefit of Jordan, Syria and Israel, even while pretending to support it.

His rejection of U.S. arms, as "imperialism."

His acceptance of Russian arms, technicians, military advisors, thus inviting Communist subversion of the region.

His demolition charge against the Baghdad Alliance created by the West to insulate the Middle East against the Soviets.

His contravention of treaty obligations, when he seized the Suez Canal, inviting ultimate Soviet control of this vital waterway.

His conspiracy against France in North Africa, against Britain in Jordan, against the Western interest in every Arab state.

His violent denunciation of the U.S. and the West over the same state-controlled radio that heaps praise on the Soviet Union.

To strergthen Nasser is to strengthen the man who has made Egypt the beachhead for the Russians. Let those who doubt explain away the massive arms cached in the Sinai desert and captured by the Israelis.

Nor are we blameless for the present crisis.

Nasser's ambitions produced his arms deal with the Russians, making way for the fulfillment of the 200-year-old Kremlin dream of a foothold in the Middle East. That Egypt and Nasser both could be so greatly daring is a result of eight years without peace and with expanding appeasement by the United States of Egypt and the other Arab states, in the vain hope of winning military alliances.

Russia's emergence as the accepted friend of the Arabs derives from its adoption of our own formula of trying to win friends through arms. It is we who conceived our security in terms of arms to Arab governments, military alliances and bases. In the process, we gave little consideration to the needs of 40 million people on whose poverty and nationalism Russia built with speed and inventiveness. How ineffectual that policy was is best proved by the speed with which the Russians bypassed the Baghdad Pact, intended to serve as a barrier against her.

Simultaneously we denied Israel arms, refused her a mutual security pact, left her surrounded by enemies to defend herself.

This isolation has been compounded by the United Nations. Since 1952, it has taken no initiative to bring about a settlement of Palestine problems.

Indeed, the U.S. and the U.N., both, in deference to the Arab States, refused to press for peace.

For years we have been blackmailed into refusing to press for peace, lest we offend the Arab States. Now we are being blackmailed by the threat of Russian "volunteers."

Russia has developed into a fine art subversion by "volunteers." It will not give advance notice to the world of their despatch. Indeed, we have no way of knowing that they are not already in Egypt and Syria -- whatever their immediate guise.

The answer to the present crisis is not new appeasement.

Has constant appeasement won us the regard and friendship of the Arab world? Has it brought us nearer to peace and stability in the Middle East? Has it kept the Comm nists away from the crossroads of the world? Clearly, it has done nothing except to demonstrate its futility.

The answer is peace in the Middle East; and internationally guaranteed freedom of passage through the Suez Canal. Peace by negotiation between the Arab States and Israel. Not an imposed peace!

By putting our weight behind direct peace negotiations, we deny the Russians their excuse for exercising their role as the would-be protectors of the Arab world through "volunteers."

Direct peace negotiations offer the hope of just settlements, satisfactory to both sides, settlements which could be permanent. An imposed settlement does not. And because it does not, it fails to provide the stability indispensable to the region's development and indispensable to denying to the Russians the fallow ground for their expansion.

Nor is a return to the status quo ante the answer.

To insist on this is as dangerous as it is impossible. For it no longer exists. The status quo ante is not an armistice line. It was a system of checks and balances which assumed an arms balance controlled by the West, and that the Arab States, if not pro-Western, were at least neutral. That is no longer true.

The fact is that Nasser, despite his proclamation of independence, is a creature of the Soviet Union, to whom he has mortgaged the economy of Egypt with his arms deals. Today he is guided in every move by Soviet advisors.

The fact is that Syria is openly in the Soviet orbit, bound to Moscow by bonds which have made that country a new base for Russian military concentration in the Middle East.

The fact is that a pro-Egyptian, and this means a pro-Russian government, holds the reins of power in Jordan.

The fact is that anti-British and anti-Western influences threaten the government of Iraq, despite its awareness of the Russian menace.

The fact is that Christian Lebanon is in danger of being swamped by the pro-Egyptian, pro-Russian influences in its own country.

The fact is that Saudi Arabia, despite its hatred of Communism, is a source of funds for Nasser and is infiltrated by Egyptians.

The fact is that all the Arab countries continue to demand Israel's obliteration.

And if we now further appease the Egyptian dictator who has defied the West, contravened the U.N. Charter and the rule of law, we are only inviting other countries in the Middle East to adopt a similar policy on the score that it pays off.

Insistence on the status quo ante means strengthening Nasserism, strengthening Soviet penetration, and inviting new disaster.

The temptation is large for the U.S. to go it alone and to "save" what remains of our influence in the Middle East by new appeasement -- at further sacrifice of Israel.

This is a perilous concept. The U.S. will not find a vacuum in the Middle East. It will find the Russians there -- moved to greater daring by the split in the Grand Alliance. The contest will be open and naked. Nor will we win that battle if the new policy is to be the old policy of more appeasement of Arab governments.

For we are dealing here with many factors, the most important of which is Arab nationalism. Today it is in a frenetic stage, used by its own politicians to promote their own ambitions and as a lightning rod to deflect the anger of the masses against their poverty. In their turn, the Russians play on these ambitions to undermine and to replace the West.

But at the root of nationalism is poverty and ignorance and the new-found knowledge of a better lot in the Twentieth Century world.

In its fundamental sense the competition is for the allegiance of the peoples of the Middle East, who back the Russians because they have been won by slogans, the promise of meeting vital human necessities.

This is a challenge which the greatest democracy on earth can meet -- if it puts its mind and heart and resources into the job. The improvement and the welfare of the impoverished masses -- fast, generously and effectively -- is entirely within our realm.

But this can only be done in the context of stability. Stability means first of all peace -- peace worked out by the parties themselves, brought together by the United Nations; not imposed by forces foreign to the region and its problems.

Is such a thing possible in the present state of affairs?

We think it is -- if the United States, both in and out of the United Nations, will put its full weight behind it.

Not once in eight years have the parties met to iron out the issues face to face. The time has come to let them know that the world will no longer temporize with intransigeance.

If the United Nations will act to this end with the same determination and vigor as it has acted on the cease-fire and other matters in the present crisis, direct negotiations can result.

It is a matter of record that Israel wants peace, seeks peace. It is equally a matter of record that the Arabs resist it. But the same U.N. Charter that has been used to flog Israel in recent weeks can also be used to compel the Arabs to negotiate peace. Nothing less than that will produce results.

The United States now has an opportunity to make a positive move in the United Nations for a definitive settlement of the Arab-Israel question through direct negotiations by the parties.

It can state openly and forcefully that:

1. Israel is here to stay;

2. That it is prepared to guarantee borders finally agreed upon between the parties;

3. That it believes the Middle East is essentially a single region, and that its component nations are therefore interdependent;

4. That it is prepared, in the context of real peace, to help finance large-scale regional development under the auspices of the United Nations.

Such a concept of regional development must be based, not on rich plums fabricated to appease dictators, but upon the use of regional resources in the most effective way for the mutual benefit of all the peoples of the area.

It is hard to see how the power blocs or the Russians can resist a call for direct peace negotiations if the U.S. has the courage and determination to make one. And if resist they do, then it is up to the United States to exercise the full weight of its power to bring it about nonetheless.

What will the Arabs do? Might such a move not cost us the Arab world? How much of the Arab world is with us now?

We have been the victims of self-delusion that the real danger is that the Arab States will close off our access to the enormous oil reserves of the Middle East and deny us the right of passage through Suez.

The Egyptians themselves have now blockaded the Canal and it will be months before salvage is completed. The Iraqi petroleum lines in Syria have been breached. As a result, Europe faces an oil shortage. But with time and cooperation, the large reserves of United States, Venezuelan and Canadian oil, the development of synthetic oil can serve the fuel needs of Europe. Large tankers and new pipelines can with time effectively insulate the world against a future blockade of the Suez Canal. In short, the Western world can improvise emergency solutions and produce permanent ones without Suez or Middle East oil.

Not so the oil-rich lands of the Middle East. Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iraq depend almost entirely on oil income from European markets for their national budgets. For them there is no replacement for the European markets. The Russians have no need of their oil. Russian interest is only in denying it to the West.

Peace is a lifeline for the governments of the oil countries. It means money, power and the ability to develop their countries. One billion dollars a year and more is what they stand to lose.

If now, having at such bitter cost to our Allies established that we are not a colonial power, we produce a policy of the quid pro quo, we have a chance of restoring the balance.

But to restore the balance we need peace between the Arab States and Israel; and a re-forming of the alliances between the United States and its allies. If Britain and France are ruined and Israel smothered, the United States stands alone. Is that what we want? That is what Russia wants. Shall we give her that victory?

Finally, Mr. President, Middle Eastern peace would stall the Russian offensive in the region more effectively than any other thing. It would remove the lever of anti-Israel hostility with which the Soviet Union has pried its way into Egypt and the rest of the Arab world; remove the incentive to sell freedom for Russian arms; and divert the energies of the region from destructive purposes to the ends of economic development and social progress. In that direction lies the real deterrent to the Communists.

Sunday was a milestone in history--the first time I ever voluntarily turned on a television program. It was an admirable show; though I imagine you are going to have to scrabble around pretty hard to find material to keep it up to that level.

Afterward I phoned to see if you could come around to the Algonquin and have a drink, but they told me that with great presence of mind you had already left the studio. However, I trust the drink may be had some day, either here or there.

Dear Elmer:

It is the 4th of July. I am sitting in our log house on Quaker Hill. Governor Dewey is off equipping himself to be Secretary of State under Eisenhower. Casey has exhausted his supply of fireworks without suffering serious damager, and I am sitting here wondering whether or not there is the slightest chance of persuading you and Bliss to spend a few days with us sometime in the course of the summer. I shall probably be here during all of July and will then go traveling somewhere, perhaps to Yugoslavia during the month of August. If you could make it I would be glad to pick you up in New York, it is only about a two hour drive up here.

Dear Edwd.--

All your observations last night about the Voice of America, and the desirability of separating it from the State Department, are valid enough; and they were clearly in our minds in 1945 when we made the contrary recommendation, which the President followed. They were all outweighed however by a single consideration--that an independent agency, in peace time, would never survive its first encounter with John Taber and the other axe men on the Appropriations Committee. And indeed in 1947 General Marshall had to make four personal trips to the Hill to persuade them to let it continue, even in skeleton form.

Since then of course it has had legislative authorization, and in a time of shooting a few more people are probably persuaded of its utility. But the Appropriations Committee knocked out 90% of what they asked for new construction, and is likely to make a very heavy slash in operating expenses. Standing by itself, I doubt if it could survive this summer.

Sorry that I offered you a useless contribution last night. I had been under the impression that the entire section on the Voice of America was to be devoted to comments; and knowing from experience, past and present, that nineteen out of twenty of such comments would be hostile or at least critical, I thought I would give you the twentieth. The demonstration of how it actually works was of course much more effective.

By the way, the most effective discussion of this matter has come, somewhat to my surprise, from Eddie Bernays--not only in this morning's Tribune but for some time previously.

Be it far from me to question your judgment; but it would seem to me that this Korean business, so long as it stays in Korea, is not worth the attention of a reporter responsible for all the world's news; who might as well stay at home and find out about Korea from Homer Bigart. If on the other hand it gets out of Korea, the place where you can get more news than anywhere else is Washington.

Of course, you may feel a compulsion to get shot at again, though I should think you have had your quota of that. But if if this becomes general you might possibly enjoy that privilege even here, in view of the at least theoretical capabilities of the Russian air force.

Dear Elmer:

After having another look at the testimony in connection with S.1333, it seems to me that the record indicates clearly that neither Bill Henry nor Frank Stanton were advocating legislation along the lines of CBS news policy. They are both opposing such action. These seem to me the revelant quotes:

(Henry)

"To sum up: This is an important problem, but NOT a new problem. The radio networks, the individual stations and the individual broadcasters have long recognized it, both as a responsibility and as an opportunity, and have sought to meet it. I believe that their voluntary solution, currently applied almost universally, is about as good a solution as can be reached."

(Stanton)

"Section 18 of S.1333 regarding identification of news source is another example of the impracticability of laying down specific operating rules in a statute. While responsible broadcasters will agree with the purpose of this section, we believe that the purpose is best accomplished by voluntary adherence to a high professional standard in the field of news and news analysis just as in the newspaper field."

OFFICE COMMUNICATION

Mr. Murrow

From Mr. Halpern

July 8, 1947

Thanks for sending me a copy of Elmer Davis' letter to you regarding Bill Henry's testimony on the White Bill. I am at a loss to understand how Mr. Davis concluded from Henry's testimony that he was recommending legislation based on the CBS news policy or anybody else's, for that matter.

After offering a statement on behalf of the Radio Correspondents Association which Mr. Davis correctly interpreted as opposing legislation on news source identification, etc., proposed in the White Bill, Bill Henry submitted an additional statement on behalf of Bill Henry. He did not presume to speak on behalf of CBS at all.

In any event, far from advocating legislation along the lines of CBS news policy, Henry said:

> "To sum up: This is an important problem, but NOT a new problem. The radio networks, the individual stations and the individual broadcasters have long recognized it, both as a responsibility and as an opportunity, and have sought to meet it. I believe that their voluntary solution, currently applied almost universally, is about as good a solution as can be reached." (Underlines supplied)

Henry goes on to state that the judgment of news and news analysis and commentary properly belongs with the listener, in whom he places much confidence.

If CBS' position with respect to Section 18 of the White Bill pertaining to news source identification is still unclear, I quote you from Frank Stanton's statement:

> "Section 18 of S. 1333 regarding identification of news source is another example of the impracticability of laying down specific operating rules in a statute. While responsible broadcasters will agree with the purpose of this section, we believe that the purpose is best accomplished by voluntary adherence to a high professional standard in the field of news and news analysis just as in the newspaper field."

Dear Elmer:

You have me something at a disadvantage since I haven't yet had a chance to read the full transcript of testimony on the White-Wolverton bill. I certainly agree with you that there is a recognizable and important difference between a statement of company policy and the advocacy that that policy shall be embedded in a statute.

I am under the impression that our management had no intention of advocating language or legislation in this area. If there should be a misunderstanding on the part of Senator White or the clerk of the committee, I am sure we will want to outstraighten it.

When come you again to this city of steam, scurry and scamper? I can now report, on the basis of limited research, that both the bourbon and the temperature at the Century are conducive to good conversation.

Dear Ed--

I presume you have seen the very penetrating critique of the White-Wolverton bill which Bill Henry offered the other day to the Senate Commerce Committee, on behalf both of the Radio Correspondents' Association and of the news analysts and/or commentators. I presume also that his offering for the record of CBS's famous statement of policy of August 1939 was by instruction. And I presume further that you are familiar with Senator White's statement on the introduction of the bill, which in its explanation of Section 18 says that "one of the largest radio networks has undertaken to follow this policy and is worthy of commendation for it."

Senator White assured a delegation which called on him that he had no pride of authorship in Section 18--as indeed he should not have, since it was of course Burt Wheeler's work. And he invited us to submit any suggestions we might have for better language to accomplish the same purpose. Bill Henry, on behalf of the Radio Correspondents' Association, submitted a statement which boiled down to saying that Section 18 simply won't do, and cannot be satisfactorily amended. But on behalf of CBS he submitted a statement which Senator White (or the clerk of the committee, as the case may be) appears to regard as identical in substance with Section 18. And since Senator White--who, as you doubtless know, is an excellent person--appears to want to meet the needs of the trade in so far as his judgment of the public interest will permit, it seems to me far from impossible that we shall eventually see the substance of the CBS policy statement written into the bill.

I need not remind you of the circumstances in which that statement was drawn up. In view of the hysterical fear of "propaganda" which prevailed in August 1939 it was sound network policy, as of that time. It would be unseemly for an employee of a competing organization to offer any opinion as to how far CBS news analysts live up to it at present. But I venture to recall your attention to the fact that when I worked there that policy, in its strict and literal interpretation, was violated several times a day--not least by one Edward R. Murrow. As it would have to be violated, until International Business Machines manufactures a mechanical news commentator (I mean analyst, of course) of guaranteed objectivity. Persons so diverse as Bill Henry and Fulton Lewis have pointed out to the Senate committee that the mere selection of news implies editorial judgment.

I don't think that policy statement did any harm to CBS--though it might have, if any attempt had been made to enforce it in literal stringency. But if it should be embedded in the statutes of the United States it could do a lot of harm--especially if the FCC's administration of the act were watched over, as under the Legislative Reorganization Act it must be, by Congressional committees some of whose members would certainly dislike what some of us say on the air.

This is not a communication from an employee of the American Broadcasting Company to an executive of another network; but merely some observations offered to a man who used to be in the radio news business himself from one who is still in it and would like to stay in it--because it offers more fun, as well as more money, than the transmission or interpretation of news by the more obsolescent methods of communication. It would be improper for me to suggest to you any action program, even if I had one. I haven't; but I can only trust that CBS's pride of authorship in a document which made sense, in the circumstances and at the time in which it was written, will not encourage the Senate to go ahead in a course which might eventually reduce CBS, as well as all other networks, pretty much to reciting the headlines offered by one or another of the wire services.

Douglas,

December 3, 1958

Dear Bill:

I am utterly without judgment of any kind. The schedule that I am trying to carry ties me to New York and Washington and there is no chance of my joining you on the trip to Ripley, Tennessee. But I do have an alternate suggestion. If you can get free for a weekend any time in January, do come up to our little shooting preserve in Dutchess County, only about seventy-five miles north of New York, and I can promise you plenty of duck, pheasant and quail. The shooting is artificial, but we have about nine hundred acres and the birds fly.

I am wondering if you have had a chance to see our new effort called SMALL WORLD on Sunday afternoons at 6 p.m. I have designs upon you for that one - maybe to talk with someone in Iran and in London about common points of law. What think you?

As ever yours,

PERSONAL

Dear Ed:

I am sorry we missed out on the fishing trip last July.

A friend of mine from Ripley, Tennessee, has written me, and wants you and me to come down to do some duck shooting next month.

We would fly to Memphis. Ripley is about 80 miles from there and he would meet us at Memphis in his car. He has a comfortable house which more or less floats on logs and which is reached by boat. He has a fine cook, comfortable quarters, etc. From there we go out in small motorboats to the blinds. The big flight should be on before Christmas.

Yours faithfully,

Bill

Dear Bill:

I am not the churlish and ungrateful bastard you must think. The fact is I have been trying to whipsaw my schedule in such a way as to accept your most attractive invitation. I am sorry to say it just can't be done. I have no choice but to go back on both radio and television by mid-September and that means that I am tied here. I am truly sorry.

There is a bare chance that I may sneak three or four days of steelhead fishing on the Rogue immediately after the Republican Convention. Any chance of you joining me?

The only interesting project I have afoot is the possibility of going to Belgrade the first week in September to do a long television interview with Tito.

June 5, 1956.

Dear Ed:

A friend of mine in Louisville, Kentucky, Stuart MacLean, has a place up in Canada on James Bay. You will find it at the tip of Hudson Bay. This is a private place and, I understand, a sumptuous one.

You can leave Toronto by train at 6:30 p.m. and arrive at Porquis, Ontario, the following day. Stuart MacLean's plane can meet us and fly us over to James Bay; and then when we finish, fly us back to Porquis where there is an outgoing train to Toronto at 7:15 p.m.

It is a famous spot for geese. I have to be in Washington, D. C. September 29th as the Court convenes October 1st. I have been thinking of spending the 25th, 26th and 27th at James Bay with Stuart MacLean and one or two other friends. Stuart and I would like very much to have you come along. Do you think you could work it in? Maybe after two conventions you will feel like shooting a whole flock of geese.

Dear Ed:

I'm delighted you are seeing Nehru. Start off with two questions -

(1) Is Red China on an expansionist move?

(2) Are the overseas Chinese in Asia (12-1/2 million) advance agents for the Red Chinese Communists?

I talked with him about these two matters last July for two hours; and he was most eloquent.

Yours faithfully,

Dear Bill:

I wish I had some helpful suggestions on the Himalayan film, but right now I haven't.

Confidentially, I am going to London on the weekend. Nehru has agreed to sit down for a couple of hours in front of cameras to answer questions. If you think of any questions that might start him talking, perhaps you would be good enough to jot them down.

January 26, 1955.

Dear Ed:

I guess you and I are predestined to have fun together but to make no money together.

I've at long last made all the rounds and there is no market for the Himalayan film. The Persian film which you thought you might use on See It Now is also apparently dead.

Travel Enterprises Inc. in which you have some stock is not bankrupt. But it has spent nearly $5,000 and has little cash left.

My tax lawyers say the best thing to do is to liquidate Travel Enterprises Inc. this year and take the losses.

As to the films, my advisers say there is only one real alternative and that is to put them all together with a 1-1/2 hour reel and take them around personally and give lectures. I can give a half dozen a year, perhaps.

So that is the present program. I'll see you before long, I hope, and talk with you about it. You will have advice and suggestions that I am sure will be most helpful.

Dear Ed —

I hoped you received the tape I sent containing Langlois speech which I put on my tape recorder in Kuala Lumpur. I also hope you can use it. When you do would you cable the American Consul at Singapore the date of the broadcast. Everyone here in Southeast Asia is greatly interested in Langlois & the tough problem he has.

If you cannot use the recording, could you put it in some competent radio hands. I am very anxious — as a pure public service — to get his message across. The situation is much more desperate than American readers as ever imagined.

Dear Ed:

Last Friday, Milo Ryan, of the faculty of the University of Washington, School of Journalism, dropped in to see me. You may remember Milo. Your picture adorns the walls of his classroom.

Milo is an outstanding young man in my opinion, and has done some outstanding work for us during the past several years. He wanted me to write you in his behalf, since I don't know Sig Mickelson. I asked Milo to give me a memo and an outline of the proposed letter. These I enclose, since I could not improve upon them except to add some more literary adjectives.

If you, or any of your boys, could put this in the mill to help Milo in his aspirations, I would appreciate it, but, more than that, you would be giving help to the kind of guy you and I esteem.

I learn that I have been, or I am about to be, elected president of Travel Enterprises of which you are (or are about to be) a stockholder.

Believing as I do in the principles of democracy, and having my voice tuned to the will of my constituents, I eagerly await some word from you.

Dear Mr. Justice Douglas:

Thank you very much for having sent on to me the three reels which you took in Afghanistan, Pakistan and India last summer. They make an extremely interesting record.

I must say that the photography was professionally done. The composition and the color balance are excellent and the individual subject matter was apparently picked with care and with an eye to what would interest the viewer. Although I could not run the recordings in synchronization with the picture, they sound extremely interesting and I would hope that you might at some time be able to synchronize the sound with the film, together with a narrative. If you should be in a position to do this, I am sure that many theatres throughout the United States would be most anxious to show the film, if you would permit them to do so.

Do you wish me to return the film and the recordings to Ed Murrow or direct to you - or is there some other disposition which you would like to have me make of them?

I do hope that I may have the pleasure of seeing you again either when I am next in the east or when your duties permit you to be out this way once more.

The corporation is in funds and solvent and I imagine that the bills which have been incurred for the production of the Iran movie for television are due and payable. You can send them either to me or direct to Mr. Clifford.

I am leaving tomorrow to be gone about two weeks. My address for most of that time will be La Osa Ranch, Sasabe, Arizona. My telephone and telegraph address is La Osa Ranch, Tucson, Arizona.

Three other parties have wanted to see the Himalayan movies. One is Mr. Julien Bryan of the International Film Foundation, 1600 Broadway, New York City. He was highly recommended by a mutual friend. Another is Irving Jacoby of Affiliated Film Producers, 164 East 38th Street, New York City. The third is Mr. Ilya Lopert of Lopert Films, New York City. I have told each of these gentlemen that you have the duplicates of the film and undoubtedly will be happy to arrange for them to see the movies if they want to see them this month while I am away. I gathered from a friend of mine that Lopert may be an exceedingly good prospect and I was particularly anxious to be on hand when he saw the film because perhaps my explanation would excite some interest. Anyway I think that interest in the Himalayan movies is growing. Perhaps we can reach a decision the first part of March after my return. Court sits for a week beginning March 3rd. But the week of March 10th is relatively free.

Yours faithfully,

Bill

FORM L-4

Mr. M
S. Y. S.

TO: Justice Douglas

FROM: Roy Lockwood

January 31, 1952

The outline in its present form is too flat, too close to a travelogue narration. It needs a point of view. What are we trying to tell the audience?

I suggest the story line should be that the present situation in Iran is typical of all Asia — it is the outbreak of revolt against poverty and oppression by millions of suppressed people. If we can understand the Iranians we will understand what is happening in Egypt, North Africa, India, the Far East. And how Russian Communism is using this situation to gain friends and influence people and we are not.

We have to write a narration which does not stray too far from our available material yet contains some sort of story line rather than straight description. Here are some general observations:

1. The present outline could be better in its opening. I think the map is useful, but the opening should also state the theme.

2. The absentee landlord point comes in too soon. Incidentally, I am not straight in my own mind from the book on this point. The heads of the tribes which we show in the film--Amar Khan, Samsam, the chief of the Gashghais--are presented as fine men. But are not these men the landowners of their respective tribes?

3. Instead of the straight descriptive pieces on the Kurds, the Lurs, the Bakhtiari, the Gashghais, it would be better if we could talk a little more against the pictures and use the pictures we have to forward the main story line. For instance, instead of--"In Western Iran live the Lurs. They are, etc. etc."--It would be better to be talking in general about the primitive farming methods and use the Lurs to illustrate. Similarly--in the overall story--the Iranian peasants are proud, independent, and some of them quite rich and powerful as a potential fighting force, using the Gashghais sequence to illustrate.

4. A piece such as this on Iran requires, as well as a point of view, a style. It could be written in "Time style" if the same pictures were going to be part of a March of Time release. It could be written in "Murrow style" (he may deny he has one) if it were going to be narrated by Ed Murrow. Your style should be your own, and if I may suggest it, I think it should be as simple and forthright as possible as coming from a man who knows the facts from first-hand observation.

If you could therefore redraft the outline from your knowledge of the facts, more or less along the lines of the present outline, but keeping to one story line to illustrate a point of view, I think we could fairly easily then move in to the next draft which would be written closely to the cut film.

I plan to get in touch with you by telephone at 5 P.M., Friday, February 1.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Today I received a note from Justice William O. Douglas in which he says:

"The Asiatic film that I took last summer is now in the hands of Ed Murrow of CBS. Ed has decided to come into the production of it so we now have two things to sell: Ed and me, and the film and the sound track. We are going to make a documentary. Ed is at the present time engaged in canvassing the situation to see who might be interested and what the best bet would be. You might want to go over sometime and talk to him about it."

I'd appreciate it if you'd let me know when it will be convenient for you to see me. Will you let me know.

Just as a reminder, we did meet at CBS the day that you, the Justice and several others listened to his sound track.

Best wishes.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Douglas:

Pardon the delay in answering your letter of November 23, but I have been out of town for the past few days and just got back.

I think that everything you suggest in your letter can be done right out of Washington. I have discussed the whole project with Joe Wershba and he can make all the necessary arrangements if you get in touch with him at WTOP.

As for the cost involved, we are certain that the billing should not run over $50 or $60 and in any event, whatever it adds up to, we'll handle it on a strictly cost basis.

I have one other idea: If I were you, I would take the log of the recordings and write whatever introductions you want for them, then come into WTOP and record this portion--after which Wershba can splice your commentary into the proper places and then feed the completed tapes on to regular size discs. This would save you considerable time and perhaps a bit of aggravation.

If there are any other problems that come up please feel free to get in touch with me and I will be glad to do what I can to straighten them out. Incidentally, the tapes are now with Wershba in Washington. Ed sends his best.

Kindest personal regards,

John A. Aaron

I wonder if you received my letter of November 23rd inquiring about the minitape and my question concerning the making of records from it.

It now appears I will be in New York City a few days next week, and I could make the records at that time. Could I do it at CBS? What would be the approximate cost?

I appreciate very much your help on the matter.

Dear Mr. Aaron:

I was in such a rush last Tuesday that I did not have a chance to talk with you. I think it probably would be best to have some records of those minitape recordings made. Could you tell me how much it would cost to make records and how I can go about doing it? IRAN - JUSTICE DOUGLAS

Third Draft

MURROW: Last week there were riots in Egypt and Morocco. Yesterday there was another outbreak in Iran. All over Asia there are potential spots of unrest which may erupt at any moment. In the centre of this explosive area is the ancient land of Persia. Not many of us know much about it, even under its modern name of Iran, and we thought you might like to hear from a man who went there to see for himself what the country and the people are like. He is Justice William O. Douglas, and he is waiting to speak to us in Washington.

(Douglas comes in on monitor. Murrow and Douglas speak. Then Douglas alone on monitor).

DOUGLAS: The Middle East is the great staging ground for the imperialistic designs of Russia. The upheavals in Iran are not Communist inspired, but the Communists are using the situation to spread their ideas and increase their strength within the country. I have seen this first hand and it is something that we in the West cannot just ignore. Iran is important to us if only for the oil - one fifth of all the known oil reserves in the world are there. So we've got to do something about it.

(He goes to a large scale map in background. The camera is far enough away to show Iran in relation to the Mediterranean and India. As Douglas speaks, using a large paper knife from his desk as a pointer, the camera dollys in to pick up Iran by itself.)

DOUGLAS: Persia is a remote and lonely place. You get on a plane at Beirut and it takes four hours to reach Tehran - like going from New York to North Dakota. To the west is Turkey and the Arab world. To the east, Afghanistan. Across the northern border is Russia, and when you are there you feel really shut in, with the Soviets hanging over you like a big black cloud.

Revolution is a constant threat in the Middle East.

(FILM BEGINS)

Crowds milling about Rioting
Tearing down signs
Police and rioters

Today a spirit of nationalism is sweeping Iran, a country which has been invaded throughout its history, by one foreign power after another. The violent emotionalism which has characterised the dispute with the British over oil, stems from ingrained memories of exploitation going back over two thousand years. But there are other things besides oil behind the present disorders.

Landscape

Iran is mainly an agricultural nation, and like most Asiatic countries, the mass of the people are poor, while a few individuals are rich.

TEHRAN

Even in the capital city of Tehran there is far more poverty than wealth. While its schools and university, its few public buildings, a block or so of modern shops, suggest a prosperous modern city, Tehran is in reality little different from what it was centuries ago. There is little education for the villagers, who bring their produce into the market from outlying districts.

Public buildings

Street scenes

The municipal water system is an open ditch which runs the length of the city. Here people bathe, wash their clothes, and drink the water. On the south side of town are the slums, clay pits where people are huddled together in filth and disease.

Water ditch

Poor streets

Clay pits

Yet Iran is a rich land. It has abundant oil reserves, estimated at one fifth of the world's total supply. Of all Europe's oil needs in recent years, some Koming percent have come from Iran.

Landscape

Oil scenes

It has fertile valleys which support the sometimes vast herds of sheep of the migratory tribes, as well as other animals and wild life. It is rich also in other ways.. Its people are Moslems, and deeply religious. The teaching of its religious leaders gives a spiritual strength to the people which is often lacking in Western countries. And Iran is a land of ancient glory.

Landscape

Moslems

Persepolis was the old-time capital of Persia, built by Darius about 500 B.D. Darius was a great and noble king, the man who put Daniel in the lions den and later embraced Daniel's faith. Persians are proud of their race, and Persepolis stands for them as a memorial to their rich and ancient culture.

Persepolis

Peasants

Yet today the most important single factor in Iran is the poverty of the vast majority of its people. Nowhere is this more apparant than in the tribes of Iran, which total about one quarter of the total population.

Kurd scenes

Up north are the Kurds, the original Medes, of the Medes and Persians. Today they occupy the northwest territory called Azerbaijan. Within recent years in some villages, as much as ten per cent of the people have died of starvation though the graneries of the landlords were filled with grain. Along their mountain peaks runs the Russian border, and Soviet propaganda makes full use of the wretchedness of the peasants to point up the supposed millenium offered by Communism. Such men as Amar Khan Sharifi, leader of the Shakkeh tribe, well knows the real meaning behind such talk, since the Russians occupied his land during the last war and refused to leave until ousted by appeal to the United Nations in 1946.

Mountain pass

Typical of the conditions under which most of the tribes live are the Elburz Mountains, rising up from the

Hadavaands

Caspian Sea to a height of 19,000 feet. Here the people are tenant farmers, share croppers, with flocks of sheep and goats. They do not own the land, they roam the mountains, living in tents which they make from skins. Yet they are among the most independent peoples on earth, and have kept the spirit of resistance to the invader alive throughout the centuries. They earn a bare subsistence by sending milk and butter down by packtrain to the cities in the plain. As rent for the land on which they live and graze their flocks they have to pay as much as 80% of all they raise to the few men who are their landlords. Nor is the best use made of the land in most parts of the country. In Western Iran are the Lurs. Their methods of farmong are primitive. Most of the land is plowed by sticks pulled by oxen. With few roads, such areas are practically cut off from all outside communication for eight months of the year. Grain, the mainstay of their diet for the winter months, is cut by hand. And it is threshed on ancient floors where about one third of it is lost. Yet these poor people are friendly and hospitable, ready to sacrifice their only sheep or cow for the stranger who visits them as a friend.

Lurs

Oxen plowing

Better off are those tribes, such as the Bakhtiari who migrate between two homes, one for the cold season, and another at a higher elevation for the hot summer months. Their arrival at the high altitude valley of Oregon, their summer home, is celebrated by the traditional stick dance, after a journey of two hundred miles across difficult mountain passes.

Bakhtiari

Oregon landscape

Stick dance

They are fine horsemen, even the poorest man being the proud possessor of a pure-bred Arabian stallion. They know the mountain passes and would make it difficult for any invader from the north. "Persia is known for two things", it is said, "its men and its horses". Their chief, Morteza Gholi Khan Samsam, rode at the head of his own cavalry in 1909 to capture Tehran, in order to save the constitution of Iran and provide a parliament for the people.

Stampeeding horses

Gashghais

But perhaps the most formidable potential force among all the tribes are the Gashghais. Also migratory, they are nevertheless rich in material goods. They run seven million sheep and goats - more than there are in all the United States. The lower economic group averages a cash income of about $2000 a year (and there is no income tax to pay). They started a rebellion in 1946, fighting and beating the regular Iranian army - in order to oust from the Iranian cabinet three communist members.

They are some of the best shots in the world. Overnight they could produce Koming thousand armed and mounted horsemen, and keep them in the field for Koming days. They could not stand against a mechanised Russian army, but they would be relentless guerillas on the flanks of any invader. The Iranians are passionately independent. They are easily roused by nationalist oratory.

Crowd

Tudeh scenes

Nevertheless, despite the activities of the Tudeh party - the mouthpiece of Russia in Iran, which seizes on every discontent XXXX to foment trouble - communism is hard to sell in this country.

Peasants

Rich landowner

But the legitimate grievances of the peasants - absentee landlords living in luxury in Tehran, Paris, or London - widespread starvation while the country is rich in oil - and the desire for national independence - produced the environment for the sudden rise of Mossadegh. His was only a minority party, but to the people he was the man who threw out the foreign exploiter. Rightly or wrongly, public opinion was so strong over the oil issue that it propelled this minority party into a position of leadership. Mosadegh - an aristocrat, a liberal, a non-Communist - when he speaks on oil, speaks for the vast majority of Iran's peasants.

Mosadegh

(END OF FILM)

(Douglas comes in on monitor)

DOUGLAS: The complaints of the peasants throughout the Middle East are just as specific as those of our own Declaration of Independence - and just as important. They want medical care, they want schools, and above all they demand land reform. American foreign policy must take notice of these conditions. The Iranians are not communists. But a revolution of the people, as in Egypt and elsewhere, is brewing there. And Communism soars in a political vacuum. Our point four, applied at the village level, could help. But reform of the ownership of the land is more important, and is inevitable. Can we help them conduct their revolution - American style - in the spirit of our own 1776? That is the question.

IRAN - JUSTICE DOUGLAS

Second Draft

MURROW: Last week there were riots in Egypt and Morocco. Yesterday there was another outbreak in Iran. All over Asia there are potential spots of unrest which may erupt at any moment. In the centre of this explosive area is the ancient land of Persia. Not many of us know much about it, even under its modern name of Iran, and we thought you might like to hear from a man who went there to see for himself what the country and the people are like. He is Justice William O. Douglas, and he is waiting to speak to us in Washington.

(Douglas comes in on monitor. Murrow and Douglas speak. Then Douglas alone on monitor as follows).

DOUGLAS: The Middle East is the great staging ground for the imperialistic designs of Russia. The upheavals in Iran are not Communist inspired, but the Communists are using the situation to spread their ideas and increase their strength within the country. I have seen this with my own eyes and it is something that we in the West cannot just ignore. We've got to do something about it. As you said Mr. Murrow, Persia is a fairly remote place to most of us. It might be a good idea, first of all, to get a clear idea where it is.

(He goes to a large scale map in background. The camera is far enough away to show Iran in relation to the Mediterranean and India. As Douglas speaks, camera tracks in to pick up Iran by Itself.)

Persia is just south of the Russian border. To the west it touches Turkey. Just north of the border is Mount Ararat. This range of mountains running down from Ararat is the Zagros. This one here south of the Caspian Sea, is the Elburz Mountains. In the valleys and fertile plains between these two ranges - the population. Iran is mainly an agricultural nation and, like most of the Asiatic countries, the mass of the people are poor, while a few people are very rich.

Peasants farming

Tehran

Even in the capital city of Tehran there is far more poverty than wealth. While its schools and university, its few public buildings, a block or so of modern shops, suggest a prosperous modern city, Tehran is in reality little different from what it was half a century ago. It's municipal water system is an open ditch which runs the length of the city. Here people bathe, wash their clothes, and drink the water. On the south side of town are the slums, clay pits where people are huddled together in filth and disease. These are the conditions which spawn revolutions. Today the spirit of nationalism which is sweeping Iran, the savage emotionalism which has characterised the oil dispute, spring from the extreme poverty and hunger of the mass of the people.

Yet Iran is a rich land. It possesses about one fifth of all the known oil reserves in the world. It has fertile valleys which support the some times vast herds of sheep of the migratory tribes as well as other animals ~~XXX~~ and wildlife. It is rich in other ways also. Its people are

Moslems praying

Moslems and deeply religious. The teaching of its religious leaders gives a spiritual strength to the people which is often lacking in Western countries. And Iran is a land of ancient glory. Persepolis was the old-time capital of Persia, built by Darius about 500 B.C. Darius was a great and noble king, the man who put Daniel in the lion's den and later embraced Daniel's faith. Persepolis stands as a memorial to the grandeur of ole Persia.

Peasants

Yet today the most important single factor in Iran is the poverty of the vast majority of its people. Nowhere is this more apparant than in the tribes of Iran, which total about one quarter of the total population.

KURD shots

Up north are the Kurds, the original Medes, of the Medes and Persians. Today they occupy the northwest territory

Russian border called Azerbaijan. Along their mountain peaks runs the Russian border, and from behind that border comes a continuing infiltration of Communist ideas. Such men as

Amar Khan

Amar Khan Sharifi, leader of the Shakkak tribe, well knows the meaning of Soviet propaganda. He and his people own radios and are surprisingly well informed on world affairs.

Mountain pass

Hadavand sequence

Typical of the conditions under which most of the tribes live are the Elburz Mountains, rising up from the Caspian Sea to a height of 19,000 feet. Here the people are tenant farmers, share croppers, with flocks of sheep and goats. They do not own the land, they roam the mountains, living in tents which they make from skins, earning a bare subsistance by sending milk and butter down by packtrains to the cities in the plain. As rent for the land on which they live and graze their flocks they have to pay as much as 80% of all they raise to the few men who are their landlords.

Nor is the best use made of the land in most parts of the country. In Western Iran are the Lurs. Their methods of farming are most primitive. Most of the land is plowed by sticks pulled by oxen. The grain is cut by hand. And it is threshed on ancient threshing floors where about one third of it is lost. Yet these poor people are friendly and hospitable, ready to sacrifice their only sheep or only ~~XXXX~~ cow for the stranger who visits them as a friend.

Better off are those tribes, such as the Bakhtiari, whp migrate between two homes, one for the cold season, and another at a higher elevation for the hot summer months. Their arrival at the high altitude valley of Oregon, their summer home, is celebrated by the traditional stick dance, after a journey of two hundred miles across difficult mountain passes. They are fine horsemen and would ~~XXX~~ make it difficult for any invader from the north. Their chief, Morteza Gholi Khan Samsam, rode at the head of his cavalry in 1909 and captured Tehran, in order to save the constitution of Iran and provide a parliament for the people.

Gashghais migration

But perhaps the most formidable potential force among all the tribes are the Gashghais. Also migratory, they are nevertheless rich in material goods. They run seven million sheep and goats - more than there are in all the United States. The lower economic group averages a cash income of about $2000 a year (and there is no income tax to pay). They started a rebellion in 1946, fighting and beating the regular Iranian army - in order to oust from the Iranian cabinet three communist members. They are armed and mounted today, and would be relentless guerillas on the flanks of any invader.

Tudeah shots, (Koming)

The Iranians are passionately independent. Despite the activities of the Tudeah party - the mouthpiece of Russia in Iran which seizes on every discontent to foment trouble - communism is hard to sell in this country.

Peasant

Rich landowner

But the legitimate complaints of the peasants - absente landlords living in luxury in Tehran, or Paris, or London while exacting high rents - stravation while the country is rich in oil - produced the environment for the sudden rise of Mosadagh. His was only a minority party - eight out of the hundred and thirty in Majlis. But public opinion on oil was so strong that it propelled this minority into the position of leadership. Mosadegh - an aristocrat, a liberal, a non-Communist - when he speaks on oil, speaks for the vast majority of Iran's peasants.

(Douglas on monitor)

DOUGLAS: The complaints of the peasants throughout the Middle East are just as specific as those of our own ~~XXX~~ Declaration of Independence - and just as important. They want ~~XXX~~ medical care, they want schools, and above all they demand land reform. American foreign policy must take notice of these conditions. The Iranians are not communists. But a revolution of the people, as in Egypt and elsewhere, is brewing there. And Communism soars in a political vacuum. Our point 4, applied at the village level, can help them. But reform of the ownership of the land is more important, and is inevitable. How can we help them conduct their revolution - American style - in the spirit of our own 1776. That is the question.

D R A F T

The Himalayas are the highest mountains in the world. They form an enormous barricade that runs northwest and southeast across northern India and Pakistan. Their highest peak is Everest - 29,141 ft.; it and many other mountains in the range have never been climbed by man.

Even the passes -- the low saddles in the range -- are high by American standards. The lowest pass is about 13,000 ft., the highest over 18,000 ft.; the average pass is 15,000 or 16,000 ft. -- higher than any mountain in the United States except McKinley in Alaska. These passes lead from India and Pakistan into the countries to the north.

The northern countries are Tibet and Sinkiang. Tibet has recently been taken over by Communists from China. Sinkiang is ancient Chinese Turkestan, and it is still Chinese territory. But Soviet Russia has moved into ancient Sinkiang with a modern industrial development program. Sovet money, Soviet technicians, Soviet planning now dominate Sinkiang.

There are great tensions inside Tibet and inside Sinkiang. In Tibet the Buddhist Church is opposed to the Communist regime; and the Communists are starting a program of political action to break up the influence and prestige of the church.

One who crosses the high Himalayas in the western part of the range comes out in Tibet. If he crosses the central part of the range, he comes out in Ladakh, which lies against the border of Tibet and Sinkiang. In history books, Ladakh is known as Little Tibet. The people, their racial characteristics, their language and culture, their religion are Tibetan. They have been tied closely to Tibet and Sinkiang in trade and commerce that have moved for centuries over ancient caravan routes. But their political ties are with India, not with Tibet or Sinkiang.

Along the border one can feel the pressure of Communist activity and come to know the nature of Communist propaganda in Central Asia. Central Asia is a critical area. It now has airports from which Soviet airplanes can pound India. It is rich in minerals. Tibet -- the heart of Central Asia -- is the home of the Buddhist world. It is there that the Dalai Lama lives, the spiritual head of the Church. It is there that the Communists work these days to gain the upper political hand. If they can get control of the church and make it a puppet in their cause, they will spread their influence far and wide.

The story of these political maneuvers is a part of the reward for crossing the high Himalayas into Ladakh. There are other rewards of adventure along the trail.

The trek starts at Manali in Punjab, India. Manali is at the head of the beautiful Kulu Valley, rich in fruit and in the music and dances of the Hindu people. Manali looks up to Rothang Pass, 13,200 ft. We will cross that pass on foot. We will cross five other passes on mules, horses, and yaks. It will take us almost three weeks to reach Leh, the capital of Ladakh. We will hear the music of flutes and drums along the way. We will record the music and bring it home. We will photograph the famous lama dances at some Buddhist monasteries -- and record the music of huge 12-foot horns. We will see the lamas and the peasants and learn of the mounting conflict between them. We will see peaks that reach high into the sky where mountains have never been before. We will see grandeur that is startling; and we will hear music that sounds like falling water.

PART I

Iran has long been a trouble spot. She has Soviet Russia as her northern neighbor. Russia has long had designs on Iran. A century ago Russia seized vast portions of Iran along the Caspian Sea and in the region of Baku. This century she has had her troops in Iran several times - the latest in 1946. England, too, has long had her eye on Iran. When England ruled India, she saw Iran as the "back door to Asia", - the backdoor that Russia might use to expand the Soviet empire eastward. Today Iran is still the backdoor to Asia. It is through Iran that Russia would move, if and when she turns towards India. Today Iran is a rich prize. She has a fifth of the known oil reserves of the world. England had a concession from Iran that granted a monopoly in the exploitation of the oil. That oil concession soon became a bone of contention between the two countries. One Prime Minister, Ali Razmara, was assassinated because he did not oppose the concession vigorously enough. His successor Mohammed Mossadegh came to power on that issue. He repudiated the concession and went to the country with the issue. The 1952 general election in Iran gave him an overwhelming popular vote and a majority of the Parliament. Meanwhile the oil refineries are mostly idle. Meanwhile Iran struggles to maintain her budget and keep her economy solvent without oil revenue. Whether she will make a new arrangement with England, whether some other power will get the oil concession, whether Iran will herself operate the fields are the questions of the day. Those are the headlines. They can be better understood if the nature of the Persian people and some of their problems are known.

PART II

That is a brief glimpse of the peoples of Iran. There are great tensions within the country. Will Soviet Russia, the aggressive neighbor on the north, be able to use those tensions to tie Iran into the Soviet organ? Will Iran find friends in the West in support of her struggle for independence? Today Iran looks west, not north, for support and she looks with loneliness for she is a long way from friends. When one gets into a DC-6 at Beirut on the Mediterranean and flys east, it takes 4 hours non stop to reach Iran. That is the distance from New York City to Omaha.

Reel I

1. The trek starts at Manali in Punjab, India. We reach Manali, the starting point of the trek, by train. The train crosses the hot flat plains of India where teeming millions work a tired soil trying to eke out a living. Manali is at the head of the beautiful Kulu Valley.

The northern valleys of India have fewer people per square mile than the plains. The mountains valleys grow fruit, tea, rice, and corn. These valleys -- around 6,000 ft. high -- are inhabited mostly by Hindus who till the soil, run caravans of horses and mules over the Himalayas to northern trading posts, or manage small retail shops.

They are simple, friendly people who live in a world where superstition flourishes. Each valley has a god or goddess who is the guardian of the welfare of the people. When plague or sickness strikes a village, the villagers under the leadership of the priests pray to the deities and make them offerings. When there is drought and crops are threatened, they also pray to the god or goddess. In Manali the goddess is Hirma. When I arrived the corn was turning yellow for lack of water. The villagers prayed for rain and as part of their program put on strange dances -- one of which was the sword dance.

Their orchestra -- made up of men from the Untouchable Caste -- played drums and flutes for hours on end while the villagers watched. In a few hours their prayers were answered. It rained. The rain came in torrents.

By that time we were on the trail, lightly dressed -- our rubber ponchos packed. We were soaked through in a few minutes. Then the rain turned to sleet and snow and the wind came with fury. I had twenty porters carrying 900 lbs.

of camp equipment. In addition I had a cook, an assistant, and an interpreter. All of us survived the storm. But death rode on its wings.

Higher up -- a few miles beyond us in the stretch we were to cover in the next day or two -- the storm was so severe it killed hundreds of ponies, mules, and cattle.

3-7 The trail above Manali leads toward the Rothang Pass which means the Pass of Death. The mountain peaks around Rothang Pass are 23,000 to 25,000 ft. high. Timberline goes close to 13,000 ft.

On the climb to Rothang we left the chestnut trees at 8,000 ft. and the fir and spruce at 10,000; then we picked up scatterings of birch, juniper, and the thick, bushy rhododendron.

The slopes of the Himalayas above 10,000 ft. hold many wide green basins, ideal for the grazing of sheep and goats. There are great quantities of buttercups, phlox, anemones, poppies, geraniums, and cinquefoil on these slopes. Fifty thousand sheep and goats cross Rothang Pass every year en route to grazing lands high on the other side.

This trail also sees many caravans bringing salt, wool, and skins down from the north and taking cloth, sugar, and spices up from the south. The trail is centuries old and follows an easy grade. The Himalayas are full of slate rock that chips off into flat slabs. The men who have traveled this trail have laid these slabs in the trail. The effect in many stretches is that of a wide, easy staircase which, except for the altitude, is easy to climb.

My porters stopped frequently to rest and smoke. They were a friendly lot -- and very gay and happy now that their prayers for rain had been answered.

At Koti -- the last village below Rothang Pass -- we bought a chicken from a farmer; and we carried it over Rothang Pass on our packs and had it for dinner that night.

The top of Rothang -- 13,200 ft. high -- was covered with fresh snow from the blizzard we had encountered. Remnants of the storm still hovered over the pass; a raw, cold wind blew there.

There are many waterfalls around Rothang Pass -- some higher and more vivid than those of our own Columbia River Gorge. One of the largest looks like a bridal veil and is so remote that in all the centuries its music has probably seldom been heard by human ears.

Koksar is the first village on the north side of Rothang Pass. It was here that Rahul -- my interpreter -- met up with the first of many Buddhist lamas we saw. This lama -- like the lama in Kipling's book Kim -- was on a pilgrimage.

8. There were Hindu women from Kulu along the trail. They were pretty -- dark skin, sharp features, brown eyes, white teeth. They wore colored scarves over their heads. Their skirts were full. Some were barefoot; most of them wore sandals. They all wore earrings -- some had as many as 10 in each ear. Their noses were pierced and set with gold pieces. Most of them wore bracelets and anklets. They sang of love -- a song about Kunjva. It went like this:

Red, red wrist
Gold watch on wrist
Kunjva, my camp is in the plain of Chamba
Come at night time

White, white your teeth
Red lips, sweet your tongue
Kunjva, my camp is in the plain of Chamba
Come at night time

9. I had to build a bridge at Koksar. The Chandra River runs through the village; and one of its main tributaries comes in there. A bridge had been washed out by the blizzard we were in. I found about 30 travelers piled up at Koksar, waiting for the water to subside so that they could ford the river.

I suggested that we all build a bridge. Everyone else thought it was cheaper to wait. I looked for trees to cut. There were none except 2,000 to 3,000 feet high on the canyon wall. A local Indian official whose duty it was to repair the bridge had logs; but he also had a price. I negotiated with him for several hours and got the price reduced from $25 to $5. Then I promised everyone who helped with the bridge a free passage over it.

It was shortly finished -- flat slate slabs laid over logs.

These Himalayan streams are dangerous when swollen. They are not safe for man or beast. The natives believe there are angry spirits in the waters who take revenge on a man. Lives are often lost in their crossings. A good mule out there costs about $100; and that is a fortune to the average peasant.

10. There were streams we had to ford. The waters of one were so swift I was almost swept away. I was caught just in time by a local Lahuli man who was wiser about the danger of these streams than I. He dragged me to shore; and he and I helped a dozen or more other people across. There were two ladies and a baby whom we helped. Small mules and donkeys had to be unpacked before they could cross.

We followed the Chandra downstream for about 15 miles. High above us were 20,000 ft., snow-capped peaks. Below them were grassy basins and slopes where sheep grazed. But the valley is barren in summer -- rocks and sand with few places left for cultivation.

11-17. At the confluence of the Chandra and the Bagha rivers we turned east and came to the pleasant village of Kyelang, capital of Lahul -- one of India's frontier provinces. Most of the Lahuli people are Buddhists; a small minority are of the Hindu faith. One can reach Lahul only four months out of the year; the rest of the time the passes are blocked by snow. There are no power plants, no electricity, no plumbing in Lahul. It is primitive country; all labor is by hand. Men work; but the main burden of the fields is carried by the women.

These Lahuli women have Mongol features; they are mostly short and broad shouldred. They carry loads of grain and hay on their backs. They cultivate with a short handled instrument that looks like a pick but has a broader blade. Sometimes the men join them in the fields -- especially when their picture is being taken. But mostly the men sit under a tree -- serving in a supervisory role. The only work animal in this part of the world that is used on the farms is the dzo -- a cross between a cow and a yak. Their long black hair is used to make the long black dresses the women wear. The people live mostly on barley -- barley is their mainstay except for the milk and cheese from the dzo.

18. Upstream from Kyelang at a village called Jipsa I found a local Indian judge holding court in the open. All of the peasants came out to watch the proceedings -- the old and the young, the men and the women. These people had settled on government land illegally. They were squatters. They had paid no taxes; they had filed no homestead applications.

They are important people to India because they are on India's northern border. It is a nervous border where the Communist influence is strong. That is why this kindly judge was gentle with these people. "Will you eject them from this government land?" I asked. "Certainly not," he said. "They are border people who must be happy and content or else they may be used by the Communists against India's interests." "Will you make them pay back taxes? Will you make them pay for the land?" I asked. "They are too poor to pay," he replied. And then he added, "The cash income of any of these families is probably not $10 a year."

19. During a recess of the court some of the men sang. They sang a song of Anghmo -- a girl who married a man and left Lahul. All girls want to leave Lahul. No outside woman wants to marry a Lahuli man. The reasons? First, Lahuli men make their women do all the work. Second, the food in Lahul is pretty monotonous. A girl who can escape to Kulu -- and many do -- can have fruit to eat as well as barley -- fruit, and rice, and lamb.

REEL II

1. (Sheep scene should be moved near the end of Reel IV.)

2-4. Jispa, where the court was held, lies over 11,000 ft. high. From there the trail heads for Baralacha Pass, ~~almost 17,000 ft. high.~~ It follows the Bagha River all the way. The last camp site is Zing Zing Bar over 13,000 ft. There used to be a shelter here; but heavy snows crushed it. We camped there in the ruins. We got a late start in the morning because the mules went to 16,000 ft. or more looking for feed, and it took hours to catch them.

These mules -- eleven in all -- were hung with bells. Their owner was a young man -- Rup Singh. He had two assistants -- jovial, carefree youngsters. We got these mules in Kyelang, sending our porters back to Manali. These mules stayed with me all the way to Leh, the end of the trek.

5-7. The trail above Zing Zing Bar threads through great fields of broken shale rock. The ascent to Baralacha Pass ~~was~~ is steep and tiring. Below Baralacha Pass is a blue and sterile lake -- Sun Lake with no grass or trees to mark its shores. Above this lake were huge drifts of soft snow. The snow blocked the trail -- and was too soft to hold a mule. Some of the smaller animals had to be repacked. Even the more rangy, robust ones foundered awkwardly in the drifts. One got stuck and in his violent struggle cut his head on the corner of a pack box, leaving an ugly wound.

Baralacha Pass is 16,~~800~~ 200 ft. high -- a barren, rolling amphitheatre. This day it was touched with snow and wet. The peaks that surround it are covered with snow and ice -- and from Baralacha look no higher than the mountains of New England. They are 23,000 ft. peaks, shrunk to small ones when seen from Baralacha.

8. The valleys on the north side of Baralacha are mostly barren -- swept by wind, over-grazed by sheep and goats, and having little grass left.

These valleys lie between 14,000 and 15,000 ft. The night wind is cool, the sun is hot and burning -- burning fair-skinned people so that their eyes are swollen shut and their lips puffed and sore.

9-14. Some of the trails climbed steeply. Chakchu was one of our camps. It lies on a narrow ridge 15,800 ft. high. We put our bedrolls under a cliff. Our camp this night was indeed a crow's nest.

We cooked on a two-burner kerosene stove. The muleteers made gur gur cha -- tea, salt, and yak butter. This is the usual beverage with every meal in the Himalayas. If the butter is not rancid, it is quite palatable. And it is very nourishing.

At Chakchu I met up with a group of men and women who had walked from Leh to Manali -- 240 miles -- on a shopping trip. They were now on their return. One lady was in her 30's -- and she carried an eighty-pound pack. One lady in her 70's carried a forty-pound pack. This old lady -- with a head dress that made her look like a wolf -- had a bad headache that night and was sick to her stomach. I gave her medicine; and in the morning she was well again.

14-16. The trail beyond Chakchu keeps at 15,000 ft. for miles on end. The mountains are dry and barren. High up are ibex, blue sheep and wild asses. ~~There are~~ We have three more passes to cross -- passes that rise to 17,479 ft.

The natives believe that each pass has a god or goddess. Some of the deities are evil; some good. They can strike men down; those who have mountain sickness and faint or bleed at the nose are thought to have incurred the wrath of the god or goddess.

Those who cross a pass accordingly say a prayer in thankfulness for the safety of their crossing. Each pass has a pile of stones -- a monument to the god or goddess. Each traveler adds a rock to the pile and often puts up a prayer flag. These piles of rocks are called obos in Ladakh.

17. The yak is the best possible transportation at high altitudes. The yak is a member of the ox family with long hair that is usually black. I got yaks the day we had to travel 30 miles across the highest pass. That would have been too long a journey for the mules. Yaks are slow animals, averaging less than two miles an hour, but they are as sure-footed as a goat and can carry up to 250 pounds with ease. The yak groans as he walks, and there always seems to be blood dripping from his nose. But he is very reliable transport.

18-21. The village of Gya lies on the north side of our highest pass. It is a small village of a few hundred people. The houses are typically Tibetan with walls of rock stuck together with mud. The ceilings are low. The roofs are flat, the beams being poplar wood -- the only tree at this high altitude. The people are poor, having cash income per family of not more than $10 a year. In some valleys corn grows up to 12,000 feet. But in Gya there is only one crop; that is barley. It is the mainstay of the diet of the people. They have precious little meat. There are no schools in this region. There are monasteries; but there are no churches in the conventional sense. There are no hospitals and no doctors. The people live on the edge of misery and privation. They make their own clothes, the women spinning the yarn from the wool of sheep and hair of yaks.

The women in Ladakh have a peculiar headdress known as the perakh. It is a piece of leather about two feet in length that comes from the forehead over the top of the head and down across the shoulders. The leather is studded with gems, usually turquoise and agate. It is a highly decorative headdress and highly prized. The most beautiful one in Ladakh is said to be owned by the Queen of Ladakh.

REEL III

1-5. The land in Ladakh is owned mostly by the monasteries. The monasteries own well over 50% of the farming land and the land that they own is the best land. The vast majority of the people of Ladakh either are attached to the monasteries as lamas or work for the monasteries as farm tenants. The monasteries rent the land sometimes on shares, sometimes for cash. The monasteries are also the source of credit for the tenant.

Kashmir today has a liberal government. It has liberal laws governing agricultural credit. No landlord can now charge any interest on a loan to his tenant. Money lenders today are restricted to 5% on their loans. But usury and extortionate credit practices have a deep hold on this country. Ancient habits are hard to break. Ladakh is full of ugly stories about current usurious practices.

Kashmir also has a law breaking up its ancient feudal system. Under its new law every landowner is entitled to keep only about twelve acres of land. The government has taken the last of the holdings and distributed it to the tenants. In the vicinity of Leh over 20,000 acres passed from 24 landlords to the tenants. This distribution was free, the peasants not paying for the land; nor to date has the government given the owners any compensation. Whether or not the landlords should be paid is a political question that agitates Kashmir today. But in two important respects, Kashmir has not touched the central land problem of Ladakh. It has not distributed the land holdings of the King of Ladakh, who owns a large acreage, nor has it touched the land holdings of the monasteries.

The monasteries therefore continue to own most of the land in Ladakh in spite of Kashmir's new policy. The monasteries have been excluded because of the power of the lamas and because the government did not deem it expedient to disturb the status quo. The lamas are a powerful political force. They have a strong position in the community. The hold of the lamas on the people does not result from any organized activities of the church. There are few schools run by the monasteries. The monasteries have instruction in philosophy, astronomy, literature, and religion. But that instruction is for the lamas, not the laymen. Children are not taken under the wing and indoctrinated. The monasteries do not exert any power over the people through hospitals, medical care, homes for the aged, and the like. They render very little community service to the people. When a person is sick a lama will be sent to his bedside so that the lama may pray for him. Lamas conduct funeral services. Lamas perform marriage ceremonies. But the lamas keep their hold on the people by fears, superstitions, and poverty. The lama is the person who has command over the spirit world, who can drive away the evil forces, who can influence the good ones to help the people.

The lama has contact with the other world. He has the wisdom and power of the land. The peasant is illiterate. He can neither read nor write. He has no radio to listen to the news of the world. The peasant, filled with fears and superstitions, learns about the devils and demons from the lips of his parents when he is a babe, from the stories his elders tell as he grows up. The lamas also indoctrinate him with fears and superstitions. They teach that the devils are always present. Lamaism has a vested interest in the ignorance of the peasant and in the poverty of the peasant as well. Poverty and ignorance in fact go hand in hand. Poverty, indeed, is the main instrument for perpetuating and promoting ignorance.

Each monastery has a spiritual head and another lama who is the managerial head. The managerial head has his staff of working monks who supervise the making of leases, the cultivation of the lands of the monasteries, and the collection of rents. The business lama usually rides the biggest, whitest horse in the region. When he comes to a village to collect the rents, he brings with him more than the usual power and prestige of the landlord; he also brings the power and prestige of the church.

6-11. Upshi is the first village on the Indus River that we reached. We stayed with Jigmet, the head man of the village. Jigmet, the richest man in the village, owns a little more than an acre of land. He has no animals except a dzo and a few chickens. He is poor as a church mouse, but a very gracious host. Jigmet, like most Ladakhis, eats barley and wheat cakes called chappatis, an unleavened bread. He bakes barley flour and stirs it in his tea. He drinks the broth of turnips that may have some peas in it. He has fruits in season -- apples, grapes, and apricots. But he has precious little meat. Jigmet, like most other Ladakhis, lives at a bare subsistence level.

There are two schools of lamas in Ladakh. One is the Red Sect; the other is the Yellow Sect. The Yellow Sect is the reform sect, going back about 500 years. The Yellow Sect is the more powerful sect today. The head of the Buddhist world, the Dalai Lama who lives in Lhasa in Tibet, is a member of the Yellow Sect. Members of the Yellow Sect are always single men. They have a more strict discipline than the Red lama. The Red lama is permitted to marry, and some of them do.

These lamas look to the Dalai Lama in Tibet for their spiritual leadership. Many of them in fact study in Lhasa. They come back from Lhasa indoctrinated in the Buddhist faith and in its philosophy and literature.

The Buddhists believe in the reincarnation of the soul. A man does not die; his soul merely leaves his body and takes possession of a new body. This is known as reincarnation. The man who has been an evil man in his lifetime may find that his soul moves not into a human body but into some animal on his death. Man's soul lives on and on, and the constant struggle through the centuries is for man to perfect himself, first by escaping from the animal kingdom and then by working himself up to the highest, the most sublime form of life. The emphasis is on holiness, kindness, good deeds, and the maintenance of a peaceful and righteous life.

This doctrine of reincarnation has taken a special twist in Tibet. It has been used since about the 15th century to maintain the authority of the priesthood and to perpetuate the power of the lamas. The Chinese used it in order to control the selection of the Dalai Lama. And it has been used for some centuries for the selection of lesser lamas as well. For example, the head of every monastery is the reincarnation of the holy man who originally established the monastery. That is true of the Rinpoche, the boy of eleven with whom I stayed at the Hemis Monastery. When the soul of his predecessor departed, the lamas of the monastery went to Lhasa in Tibet to consult the oracle; and the oracle told how the reincarnated lama could be found in a remote province in Tibet. The lamas went there and found the boy. They satisfied themselves by various tests that the boy was the reincarnation of the former head of the monastery. He was brought back to the monastery and is under the supervision of his teacher, a man by the name of Phuntzog, until he reaches his maturity.

12-17. I stopped at Hemis Monastery for two days and visited with the Rinpoche and Phuntsog, his teacher. This boy of eleven will now go to Lhasa for ten years of study. Lhasa is now the stronghold of Red Chinese influence. Will this boy come back indoctrinated in Communist philosophy? Will he return hostile to the West, friendly to Russia? These are questions that bother the priesthood of the Buddhist world these days. When Red China got control of Tibet she won a political victory that may have repercussions far beyond the Tibetan border. Now the Communists have some control over the hierarchy of the church. They will now control the oracle who determines where the souls of the deceased lamas have gone. With that power they will control the selection of all the chief lamas in northern India. Whether they will succeed in making the church a mouthpiece for them, whether the priests will be able to resist, whether the Communists will confiscate the wealth of the monasteries and break the power of the lamas -- these are all questions yet to be answered. Only time will tell.

At Hemis I saw the lama dances. They are done on festive occasions. The orchestra is made up of drums, cymbals and horns. Two huge horns dominate the music. They are twelve feet long. They are blown from the top of the monastery in the morning to wake the monks and at night to put the monastery to bed. They can be heard for twenty miles.

The dancers are lamas. Their costumes are hundreds of years old. The masks are carved from ~~one piece~~ single pieces of wood and enameled by an ancient process. The dances represent the struggle between Good and Evil. Evil is represented by ugly characters -- Anger, Lust, and Greed. These characters are the ones that best man throughout his life. If he escapes them and prevails over them, he wins merit and advances to a higher class in the next life. If he is a victim of them, he loses merit and slips down the ladder in the next life.

The peasants come ~~in~~ from far and wide to see these dances. There they can see the evil spirits and the good ones. There they can see the struggle of man against the evil ones.

The good spirits are represented by the stag and the yak. These spirits are kind and friendly to man. They are on his side in the struggle against evil. And always in these lama dances, the outcome is the same. The Stag and the Yak route Anger, Lust, and Greed. Good conquers Evil.

Thus does the monastery bring a moral lesson home to every peasant.

REEL IV

1-2. Even though the lamas hold the people in poverty and ignorance, there is no revolt and apparently not even any resentment. The hold of the lamas is great for, as expressed in a Tibetan proverb, "without a lama in front there is no approach to God." Yet people are people the world around, and the Ladakhis show their resentment in simple, innocuous ways. It is in the form of making fun of the lamas. This is all in good taste, and one of the most dramatic ways is the singing of a famous Ladakhi folk song. The women of Gya sang it for me. The song is a take-off on a man accused of being a lama. As the women sang, they bent over, shaking their fingers at an imaginary figure at their feet as though they were scolding. And as they sang, their eyes danced with merriment, for now they were making fun of their lord and master, the one who owns their souls, their houses, their fields -- the big, rich monastery that sits like a castle on the hill.

These lamas are devout men. They spend their days from morning to night in prayer and meditation. Very often they sit for days on end in the woods by themselves, reciting scriptures out loud. Sometimes they sit and say their prayers in unison. On a holy day at the beginning of each year, the entire monastery recites out loud the entire Buddhist scriptures.

3-5. After we left Hemis Monastery we met the Indus River, a big river that rises in Tibet, flows through northern India, cuts through the Himalayas, and comes out into Pakistan. The water rights of this river constitute one of the grievances in the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan. There is some irrigation from the river. But most of the systems are ancient and inefficient. The present Indian Government has vast irrigation projects planned for this region.

There are some camels in this region, but most of the transport is by the small Tibetan pony and by mules and yaks.

There are no trade routes that run the length of the Indus River; but most of the trade routes cut across it. These are the ancient caravan trails coming down from Tibet and Sinkiang into India. The trail that I followed from Manali to Leh was one of those routes.

6-7. When I had left New Delhi, the movie film which I had sent out from America had not arrived. I did not have the time to wait for it. Prime Minister Nehru of India told me not to worry, that he would get it to me. And it was delivered in the middle of my trek in a very remote place in the Himalayas by some of the Indian patrols who ride this northern country for bandits and for Red Chinese.

As we approach Leh, capital of Ladakh and the end of the trail, we see some of the longest mani walls in the world. The mani wall is ~~a wall~~ made of rocks. ~~They are~~ And is usually ~~eight~~ six feet or ~~more~~ so tall and twenty-five feet or more wide. There is one near Leh that runs for about a mile. The rocks on the top of the mani wall are flat slabs on each of which is engraved the magic words, om mani padme hoom. It means "Oh, jewel of the lotus". The lotus, the most beautiful of flowers, grows out of mud and filth. Buddha was born out of the lotus. Buddha, like the lotus, showed that the spirit of man can rise above the lowliest source and find perfection even among the dregs of the earth.

One who passes a mani wall keeps it on his right, for there is an old Tibetan saying, "Beware of the devils on the left-and side." The chhorten is a monument of pyramid design, usually whitewashed. They are usually sepulchres where the ashes of a deceased are placed. They are sometimes connected with the mani walls. There is usually one at the entrance of a village. They guard the village, keeping the evil spirits away.

8. Ladakh is one of the few remaining places in the world where a woman has more than one lawful husband. I visited some of these families. One had the name of Dombos. This woman had two husbands. The family owned a few acres of land. The house was a two-story mud and stone affair. It was a gay and happy family. The husbands were brothers. When the oldest brother marries, his wife becomes the wife of all the brothers. The monasteries encourage this institution of polyandry. The Kashmir government opposes it. But it is deep in the traditions of the villages. The effect of polyandry is to keep the population from increasing. Lamas think it serves a good purpose in an area where the food supply is not abundant. They think so because in that way their food supply is protected.

Another polyandry family I visited were the Gyalangs. These people live in a one-room hut. There is much friction between the two brothers. The family is poor as poor can be. A good deal of the barley that the Gyalangs raise goes to make a local beer. Under the influence of this beer, the two husbands raise their voices over the wife.

9-14. Leh, the capital of Ladakh, is a town of 4,000. It lies

11,500 ft. high in a vast sloping basin hemmed by 25,000 ft. peaks. Leh has narrow winding streets made for caravans, not cars. Leh has no cars except a few jeeps of the Indian Army garrison nearby. The main bazaars in Leh are located on a long ~~and~~ L-shaped street. Each shop is flush with the street. At one end of the main street is a ~~Moslem~~ mosque to accommodate the religious needs of a small minority of Moslems in this region. Leh is a peaceful town. Buddha taught the principles of non-violence, and it has had such an effect on the people that even in the hurley-burley of the city of Leh there have been in recent years no records of any crime of violence and very few thefts.

Leh is on an ancient caravan route that leads to Yarkand in Sinkiang and Lhasa in Tibet. Wool, tea, skins, carpets, borax, salt came down from the north. Cotton goods, opium, pearls, spices, wheat, tobacco came up from the south. These caravans met at Leh and exchanges were made. Great commerce and industry flourished. Leh was indeed the great connecting link between the cold and forbidden land of the north and the warm and sunny land of the south. Today people still swarm through the bazaar of Leh as they did before. A few of the shops are still open. But the ancient hum of the market is gone. Many of the stores are closed. The heavy wooden doors of the shops have been swung shut and fastened with padlocks. Only a trickle of trade now comes down from the north. The Russians have closed the Sinkiang border. A depression has struck Leh. This ~~was~~ is not a temporary depression. It ~~was~~ is permanent because Russia has ~~turned~~ blocked the trade routes ~~around. For centuries they ran~~ that run north and south. Now they will run east and west. Russia will use the commerce of China, Tibet, and Sinkiang to lace those three regions tightly into the Soviet empire. This is a part of the Soviet empire building.

High above Leh and looking down upon it is the ancient castle of the King of Ladakh. It rises many stories like an awkward skyscraper. Once it was a place of splendor. Now it is empty, filled with cobwebs, bats and the memories of an ancient power. The King of Ladakh, a young man in his 20's, is now an officer in the Indian Army. I met him at Leh. The rule of the kings is ended. The Kashmir Government now makes the laws for this region.

When I was at Leh I saw what probably were the last of the caravans coming down from the north. The first of these were sheep. There is an old Tibetan saying that "sheep are the goods trains." Sheep and goats have been used from time immemorial to bring produce down from the north. The sheep are loaded with pack bags full of salt. They start down from the north in June and travel hundreds of miles, grazing as they go. When they reach their destination, the packs are removed and the salt sold. Then the sheep and the goats are sheared, and their wool is sold. Then the packs are ~~xxxx~~ filled with barley or corn, and the herd starts its long way back.

I saw probably the last sheep train that will come down from the north. I saw also probably the last pack train of horses and mules carrying great bales of wool. This wool is the soft wool from the under-belly of the goat. It is the wool that is used to make the famous Kashmir scarves and shawls. It comes from only parts of Sinkiang and Tibet. None of this famous wool is now traveling to Kashmir; it is going east and west into Chinese and Russian markets. As long as China and Russia keep their hold on the northern country, it will never come south again.

Central Asia is mostly in Russia and Tibet. But the northern stretch of India and the outposts along the Sinkiang-Tibetan border are also Central Asia. They are one world. The Communist regimes that lie to the north are a second world. We of the West, propelled by events so fast that we have little time to learn what we did yesterday or what we will do tomorrow, are still a third world. These worlds, when seen through the eyes of an American, seem to be far apart. But it is important that we come to know them if we are to help find solutions to the tremendous revolutions that are sweeping Asia.

Today the Communist regimes have an upper hand in this region. But with small investments in understanding and affection, the influence can shift away from Russia to the democratic influences of the West. The searching for love and affection is endless. It goes on the world around. Communism, with its cruel and exploitive character, does not carry the hopes of the people. What they want is friendship and understanding. So far we have appeared in Asia largely as a strong military figure. If we want the allegiance of these people of Asia on our side, we must show more than strength. We must show friendship and understanding. We must avoid a bloody conflict between East and West. If Asia knew our affection as well as our power, we could be wedded to her in great and noble deeds. The threat of Soviet imperialism would then disappear as the mad dream of another personality as sick as Hitler.

INTRODUCTION

MURROW: 13 sec.

This is a story of Central Asia — one of the most remote, one of the least known areas of the world. Yet today it is a critical region. Justice ~~Bill~~ WM. O. Douglas has been there. He recently crossed the Himalayas and has brought us ~~the~~ this story of Central Asia.

DOUGLAS: 50 sec.

I should start this story with the words Ju Le for those are the words of greeting along the trails of the Himalayas.

The Himalayas are the highest mountains in the world. They form the great barricade that runs across northern India and Pakistan. The average pass is higher than any mountain in the United States except McKinley in Alaska. These passes lead from India and Pakistan into the countries to the north.

The northern countries are Tibet and Sinkiang. Tibet has recently been taken over by Red China. Sinkiang is Chinese territory. But Soviet Russia has moved in with a modern industrial program. Soviet money, Soviet technicians, Soviet planning now dominate Sinkiang.

North of the Himalayas is Ladakh which lies against the border of Tibet and Sinkiang. Most of its people have been tied to Tibet by race, religion, and trade. They are politically a part of India. Along this border one can feel the pressure of communist activity and come to know the nature of Communist propaganda in Central Asia. The story of these political maneuvers is a part of the reward for crossing the high Himalayas. There are other rewards of adventure along the trail.

1 min.
11 sec. the beautiful Kulu Valley.

These mountain valleys grow fruit, tea, rice, and corn. These valleys are inhabited mostly by Hindus.

They are simple, friendly people who live in a world where superstition flourishes. Each valley has a god or goddess who is the guardian of the welfare of the people. When plague or sickness strikes a village, the villagers under the leadership of the priests pray to the deities and make them offerings. When there is drought and crops are threatened, they also pray to the god or goddess. In Manali the goddess is Hirma. When I arrived the corn was turning yellow for lack of water. The villagers prayed for rain and as part of their program put on strange dances — one of which was the sword dance.

Their orchestra — made up of men from the Untouchable Caste — played drums and flutes for hours on end while the villagers watched. In a few hours their prayers were answered. It rained. The rain came in torrents.

I had twenty porters carrying 900 lbs. of camp equipment. In addition

DOUGLAS: CONT'D I had a cook, an assistant, and an interpreter. All of us survived the storm. But death rode on its wings.

Higher up — a few miles beyond us in the stretch, we were to cover in the next day or two — the storm was so severe it killed ponies, mules and cattle.

3-7 MURROW: 1 min. 48 sec. The trail above Manali leads toward the Rothang Pass which means the Pass of Death. The mountain peaks around Rothang Pass are 23,000 to 25,000 ft. high. Timberline goes close to 13,000 ft.

The slopes of the Himalayas above 10,000 ft. hold many wide green basins, ideal for the grazing of sheep and goats.

The trail is centuries old, and follows an easy grade. The Himalayas are full of slate rock, that chips off into flat slabs. The men who have traveled this trail have laid these slabs in the trail. The effect in many stretches is that of a wide, easy staircase which, except for the altitude, is easy to climb.

The porters stoopped frequently to rest and smoke. They were a friendly lot — and very gay and happy now that their prayers for rain had been answered.

The top of Rothang — 13,200 ft. high — was covered with fresh snow from the blizzard. Remnants of the storm still hovered over the pass; a raw, cold wind blew there.

There are many waterfalls around Rothang Pass — some higher and more vivid than those of our own Columbia River Gorge. One of the largest looks like a bridal veil and is so remote that in all the centuries its music has probably seldom been heard by human ears.

Koksar is the first village on the north side of Rothang Pass. It was here that Rahul — the interpreter — met up with the first of many Buddhist lamas. This lama — like the lama in Kipling's book Kim — was on a pilgrimage.

8 DOUGLAS: 21 sec.

There were Hindu women from Kulu along the trail. They were pretty — dark skin, sharp features, brown eyes, white teeth. Their noses were pierced and set with gold pieces. /Most of them wore bracelets and anklets. They sang of love — a song about Kunjva. It went like this:

Red, red wrist
Gold watch on wrist
Kunjva, my camp is in the plain of Chamba
Come at night time

DOUGLAS:
CONT'D

White, white your teeth

Red lips, sweet your tongue

Kunjva, my camp is in the plain of Chamba

Come at night time

9 MURROW: A bridge at Koksar had been washed out by a blizzard. The Chándra

55 sec. River which runs through the village, and its tributaries were swollen. Travelers were piled up there, waiting for the water to subside so that they could ford the river.

DOUGLAS: I suggested that we all build a bridge. A local Indian official whose duty it was to repair the bridge had logs; but he also had a price. I negotiated with him for several hours and got the price reduced from $25 to $5. Then I promised everyone who helped with the bridge a free passage over it.

Logs were snaked across the river. Flat slabs were laid over the logs.

These Himalayan streams are dangerous; they are not safe for man or beast. The natives believe there are angry spirits in the waters who take revenge on a man. Lives are often lost in their crossings. A good mule out there costs about $100; and that is a fortune to the

DOUGLAS: CONT'D average peasant.

10 DOUGLAS: 5 sec. There were streams we had to ford. The waters of one were so swift I was almost swept away.

11-17 MURROW: 53 sec. At the confluence of the Chandra and the Bagha Rivers, Justice Douglas turned east, and came to the pleasant village of Kyelang, capital of Lahul — one of India's frontier provinces. Most of the Lahuli people are Buddhists; a small minority are of the Hindu faith. One can reach Lahul only four months out of the year; the rest of the time the passes are blocked by snow. There are no power plants, no electricity, no plumbing in Lahul. It is primitive country; all labor is by hand. Men work; but the main burden of the fields is carried by the women. These Lahuli women have Mongol features; they are mostly short and broad shouldered. They carry loads of grain and hay on their backs. They cultivate with a short-handled instrument that looks like a pick but has a broader blade. The men sit under a tree making sure the women work. The only work animal in this part of the world that is used on the farms is the dzo — a cross between a cow and a yak. Their long black hair is used to make the long black dresses the women wear. The people live mostly on barley -- barley is their mainstay except for the milk and cheese from the dzo. Justice Douglas found another judge!

18 DOUGLAS: 43 sec.

Upstream from Kyelang at a village called Jispa, there was a local Indian judge holding court in the open. All of the peasants came out to watch the proceedings. These people had settled on government land illegally. They were squatters. They had paid no taxes; they had filed no homestead applications.

They are important people to India because they are on India's northern border. It's a nervous border where the Communist influence is strong. These people might be used by the Communists against India. That is why this kindly judge was gentle with these people - that is why he decided not to make them pay back taxes, nor to pay for the land. They were too poor to pay; the cash income per family is not $10 a year.

19 MURROW: 16 sec.

During a recess of the court some of the men sang a song of a girl who married and left Lahul. All girls want to leave Lahul; Lahul men make their women do all the work. The food in Lahul is monotonous. A girl who can escape to Kulu can have fruit to eat as well as barley.

1-4 DOUGLAS: Jispa, where the court was held, lies over 11,000 ft. From there the trail heads for Baralacha Pass. The last camp site is Zing Zing Bar over 13,000 ft. An old shelter there was crushed by snow. We camped in the ruins.
19 secs.

5-7 1 min. 5 secs. I left my porters at Koksar and hired mules. These mules -- eleven in all -- were hung with bells. Their owner was a young man -- Rup Singh. He had two assistants -- jovial, carefree youngsters. These mules stayed with me all the way to Leh, the end of the trek.

MURROW: The trail above Zing Zing Bar threads through great fields of broken shale rock. The ascent to Baralacha is steep and tireing. Below Baralacha is a blue and sterile lake -- Sun Lake, with no trees to mark its shores. Above this lake were huge drifts of soft snow. The snow blocked the trail -- and was too soft to hold a mule. Some of the smaller animals had to be repacked. Even the more rangy, robust ones foundered awkwardly in the drifts. Baralacha Pass is 16,200 ft. high -- a barren, rolling amphitheatre. The peaks that surround it are covered with snow and ice -- and from Baralacha look no higher than the mountains of New England. They MURROW (cont'd) are, however, 23,000 ft. peaks, shrunk to small ones when seen from this high pass.

8 19 secs. The valleys on the north side of Baralacha are mostly barren -- swept by wind, over-grazed by sheep and goats, and having little grass left.

These valleys lie between 14,000 and 15,000 ft. The night wind is cool, the sun is hot and burning -- burning fair-skinned people so that their eyes are swollen shut and their lips puffed and sore.

9-14 DOUGLAS: 1 min. Chakchu was one of our camps. It lies on a narrow ridge 15,800 ft. high. We put our bedrolls under a cliff. Our camp this night was a crow's nest.

We cooked on a two-burner kerosene stove. The muleteers made gur gur cha -- tea, salt, and yak butter -- the usual beverage with every meal in the Himalayas. If the butter is not rancid, it is quite palatable. And it is very nourishing.

At Chakchu I met up with a group of men and women who had walked from Leh to Manali -- 240 miles -- on a shopping trip. They were now on their return. One lady was in her 30's -- and she carried an eighty-pound pack. One lady in her 70's carried a forty-pound pack. This old lady -- with a head dress that made her look like DOUGLAS (cont'd) a wolf -- had a bad headache that night and was sick to her stomach.

MURROW:
15-16 22 secs. The trail beyond Chakchu keeps at 15,000 ft. for miles on end. The natives believe that each pass has a god who can strike man down. Those who are sick are thought to have incurred the wrath of the god.

When one crosses a pass safely he says a prayer in thankfulness. Each pass has a pile of stones -- a monument to the god of the pass. Each traveler adds a rock to the pile and often puts up a prayer flag.

DOUGLAS:
17 32 secs. The yak is the best possible transportation at high altitudes. He is a member of the ox family, with long hair that is usually black. I got yaks the day we had to travel 30 miles across the highest pass. That would have been too long a journey for the mules. Yaks are slow, averaging less than two miles an hour, but they are sure-footed as a goat and can carry up to 250 pounds with ease. The yak groans as he walks. He is the safest, the most reliable transportation in the Himalayes.

18-21 MURROW: 1 min. 24 secs.

The village of Gya lies on the north side of our highest pass. A small village of a few hundred people. The houses are typically Tibetan, with walls of rock stuck together with mud. The ceilings are low. The roofs are flat, the beams poplar wood -- (the only tree at this high altitude). The people are poor. Corn grows at the altitude of 12,000 feet -- but in Gya there is only one crop --- barley. It is the mainstay of the diet of the people. They have precious little meat. There are no schools. There are monasteries; but there are no churches, in the conventional sense. There are no hospitals and no doctors. The people live on the edge of misery and privation. They make their own clothes, the women spinning the yarn from the wool of sheep and the hair of yaks.

The women in Ladakh have a peculiar headdress known as the perakh. It is a piece of leather about two feet in length that comes from the forehead over the top of the head and down across the shoulders. The leather is studded with gems, usually turquoise and agate. It is a decorative headdress and highly prized. The most beautiful one in Ladakh is said to be owned by the Queen of Ladakh.

REEL III

1-5 MURROW: 2 min. 58 secs.

The monasteries own well over half of the farming land in Ladakh.

The vast majority of the people of Ladakh either are attached to the monasteries as lamas, or work for the monasteries as farm tenants.

The monasteries usually rent the land on shares.

Under Kashmir law no landlord can charge any interest on a loan to his tenant. But usury and extortionate credit practices have a deep hold on this country.

Kashmir passed a law restricting landowners to twelve acres each.

The government took the rest and distributed it to the tenants.

But it did not distribute the land holdings of the King of Ladakh, nor the land holdings of the monasteries.

The monasteries continue to own most of the land. The lamas are a powerful political force who have a strong position in the country.

The hold of the lamas on the people does not result from any organized activities of the church. The monasteries do not exert any power over the people through schools, hospitals, medical care, homes for the aged, and the like. They render very little community service to the people. When a person is sick a lama will be sent

MURROW: (Cont'd) to his bedside to pray for him. Lamas conduct funeral services. Lamas perform marriage ceremonies. The lamas keep their hold on the people by fears, superstitions, and poverty.

The peasant is illiterate. He has no radio to listen to the news of the world. He is filled with fears and superstitions, learns about the devils and demons from the lips of his parents when he is a babe. The lamas also indoctrinate him.

Each monasteryhas a spiritual head and another lama who is the managerial head. The managerial head has his staff of working monks who supervise the making of leases and the collection of rents. The business lama usually rides the biggest, whitest horse in the region. When he comes to a village to collect the rents, he brings with him more than the usual power and prestige of the landlord; he also brings the power and prestige of the church.

6-11 3 min. 40 secs. Upshi is the first village on the Indus River. Jigmet is the head man and the richest man in the village and owns a little more than an acre of land. He has no animals except a dzo and a few chickens. He is poor as a church mouse, but a very gracious host. Jigmet, like most Ladakhis, eats barley and an unleavened bread made

MURROW (Cont'd) from wheat. Like most other Ladakhis he lives at a bare subsistence level.

There are two schools of lamas in Ladakh. One is the Red Sect; the other is the Yellow Sect. The Yellow Sect is the reform sect, going back about 500 years. The Yellow Sect is the more powerful sect today. The head of the Buddhist world, the Dalai Lama who lives in Lhasa in Tibet, is a member of the Yellow Sect. Members of the Yellow Sect are always single men. They have a more strict discipline than the Red lama. The Red lama is permitted to marry, and some of them do.

These lamas look to the Dalai Lama in Tibet for their spiritual leadership. Many of them in fact go to Lhasa for years of study.

The Buddhists believe in the reincarnation of the soul. A man does not die; his soul merely leaves his body and takes possession of a new body. This is known as reincarnation. The man who has been an evil man in his lifetime may find that his soul moves not into a human body but into some animal on his death. Man's soul lives on and on, and the constant struggle through the centuries is for man to perfect himself, first by escaping from the animal kingdom and then by working himself up to the highest, the most

MURROW: (Cont'd) sublime form of life. The emphasis is on holiness, kindness, good deeds and the maintenance of a peaceful and righteous life.

This doctrine of reincarnation has taken a special twist in Tibet. It has been used since about the 15th century to maintain the authority of the priesthood and to perpetuate the power of the lamas. The Chinese used it in order to control the selection of the Dalai Lama. And it has been used for some centuries for the selection of lesser lamas as well. For example, the head of every monastery is the reincarnation of the holy man who originally established the monastery.

Rim po' shay

That is true of the Rinpoche, the boy of eleven at the Hemis Monastery. When the soul of his predecessor departed, the lamas of the monastery went to Lhasa in Tibet to consult the oracle; and the oracle told how the reincarnated lama could be found in a remote province in Tibet. The lamas went there and found the boy. They satisfied themselves by various tests that the boy was the reincarnation of the former head of the monastery. He was brought back to the monastery and until he reaches his maturity is under the supervision of his teacher, a man by the name of Phuntzog.

12-13 DOUGLAS: 30 Secs.

I stopped at Hemis and visited with the Rimpoche. This boy of eleven will now go to Lhasa for ten years of study. Lhasa is now the stronghold of Red Chinese influence. Will this boy come back indoctrinated in Communist philosophy? This is a question that bothers the priesthood of the Buddhist world these days. The Communists now control the hierachy of the church and the selection of all the chief lamas. Whether they will succeed in making the church a mouthpiece for them is a question yet to be answered. Only time will tell.

1 min. 20 secs.

At Hemis I saw the lama dances. They are done on festive occasions. The peasants come from far and wide to see the dances. The orchestra is made up of drums, cymbals and horns. Two huge horns dominate the music. They are twelve feet long. They are blown from the top of the monastery in the morning to wake the monks and at night to put the monastery to bed. They can be heard for twenty miles.

The dancers are lamas. Their costumes are hundreds of years old. The masks are carved from single pieces of wood and enameled by an ancient process. The dances represent the struggle between Good and Evil. Evil is represented by ugly characters — Anger, Lust, and Greed. These characters are the ones that beset man throughout his life. If he escapes them, and prevails over them, he wins merit and advances to a higher class in the next life. If he is a victim of them, he loses merit and slips down the ladder in the next life. The audience can see these spirits and the struggle of man against the evil ones.

DOUGLAS:
CONT'D

The good spirits are represented by the stag and the yak. These spirits are kind and friendly to man. They are on his side in the struggle against evil. And always in these lama dances, the outcome is the same. The Stag and the Yak route Anger, Lust, and Greed. Good conquers Evil.

Thus does the monastery bring a moral lesson home to every peasant.

REEL IV

1 MURROW: 30 Secs. Even though the lamas hold the people in poverty and ignorance, there is no revolt and apparently not even any resentment. Yet people are people the world around, and the Ladakhis show their resentment in simple, innocuous ways. It is in the form of making fun of the lamas. This is all in good taste, and one of the most dramatic ways is the singing of a famous folk song. The song is a take-off on a man accused of being a lama. As the women sing, they bend over, shaking their fingers at an imaginary figure at their feet as though they are scolding. And as they sing, their eyes dance with merriment, for now they are making fun of their lord and master, the one who owns their souls, their houses, their fields -- the big, rich monastery that sits like a castle on the hill.

2 DOUGLAS: 15 1/2 Secs. These lamas are devout men. They spend their days from morning to night in prayer and meditation. Very often they sit for days on end reciting scriptures out loud. Sometimes they sit and say their prayers in unison. On a holy day at the beginning of each

DOUGLAS: (Cont'd) year, the entire monastery recites the scriptures out loud.

3-5 MURROW: 51 Secs. After leaving Hemis Monastery, Justice Douglas met the Indus River, a big river that rises in Tibet, flows through northern India, cuts through the Himalayas, and comes out into Pakistan. The water rights of this river constitute one of the grievances in the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan. There is some irrigation from the river. But most of the systems are ancient and inefficient. The present Indian Government has vast irrigation projects planned for this region.

There are some camels in this region, but most of the transport is by the small Tibetan pony and by mules and yaks. There are no trade routes that run the length of the Indus River; but most of the trade routes cut across it. These are the ancient caravan trails coming down from Tibet and Sinkiang into India. The trail from Manali to Leh was one of those routes.

6 6 Secs. Indian army patrols ride this remote Himalayan country looking for bandits and for Red Chinese.

7 DOUGLAS: 35 1/2 Secs. The mani wall is made of rocks. The rocks on the top of the mani wall are flat slabs on each of which is engraved the magic words, om mani padme hoom. It means "Oh, jewel of the lotus". The lotus, grows out of mud and filth. Buddha was born out of the lotus. Buddha, like the lotus, showed that the spirit of man can find perfection even among the dregs of the earth.

One who passes a mani wall keeps it on his right, for there is a Tibetan saying, "Beware of the devils on the left hand side". The chhorten is a monument of pyramid design, usually whitewashed, that contain the ashes of a deceased. There is usually one at the entrance of a village. They guard the villages keeping the evil spirits away.

8 22 1/2 Secs. Ladakh is one of the few remaining places in the world where a woman can have more than one lawful husband. I visited some of these families. When the oldest brother marries, his wife becomes the wife of all the brothers. The monasteries encourage this practice. Kashmir opposes it. The effect of polyandry is to keep the population from increasing in an area where the food

DOUGLAS: (Cont'd) supply is not abundant. That is why the lamas support polyandry.

9-14 MURROW: 2 min. 15 Sec. Leh, the capital of Ladakh, is a town of 4,000. It lies 11,500 ft. high in a vast sloping basin hemmed by 25,000 ft. peaks. Leh has narrow winding streets made for caravans, not cars. Leh has no cars except a few jeeps of the Indian Army garrison nearby. The main bazaars in Leh are located on a long L-shaped street. Each shop is flush with the street. At one end of the main street is a mosque to accommodate the religious needs of a small minority of Moslems in this region. Leh is a peaceful town. Buddha taught the principles of non-violence, and it has had such an effect on the people that even in the hurley-burley of the city of Leh, there have been in recent years no records of any crime of violence and very few thefts.

Leh is on an ancient caravan route that leads to Yarkand in Sinkiang and Lhasa in Tibet. Wool, tea, skins, carpets, borax, salt came down from the north. Cotton goods, opium, pearls, spices, wheat, tobacco came up from the south. These caravans met at Leh and exchanges were made. Great commerce and industry flourished.

MURROW: (Cont'd) Leh was indeed the great connecting link between the cold and forbidden land of the north and the warm and sunny land of the south. Today people still swarm through the bazaar of Leh as they did before. A few of the shops are still open. But the ancient hum of the market is gone. Many of the stores are closed. The heavy wooden doors of the shops have been swung shut, and fastened with padlocks. Only a trickle of trade now comes down from the north. The Russians have closed the Sinkiang border. A depression has struck Leh. This is not a temporary depression. It is permanent because Russia has blocked the trade routes that run north and south. Now they will run east and west. Russia will use the commerce of China, Tibet, and Sinkiang to lace those three regions tightly into the Soviet empire. This is a part of the Soviet empire building.

High above Leh, and looking down upon it, is the ancient castle of the King of Ladakh. It rises many stories like an awkward sky-scraper. Once it was a place of splendor. Now it is empty, filled with cobwebs, bats and the memories of an ancient power. The King of Ladakh, a young man in his 20's, is now an officer in the Indian Army. The rule of the kings is ended. The Kashmir Government now makes the laws for this region.

15-17 DOUGLAS: When I was at Leh I saw what probably were the last of the caravans
coming down from the north. The first of these were sheep. There is an old Tibetan saying that "sheep are the goods trains." Sheep and goats have been used from time immemorial to bring produce down from the north. The sheep are loaded with pack bags full of salt. They start down from the north in June and travel hundreds of miles, grazing as they go. When they reach their destination, the packs are removed and the salt sold. Then the sheep and the goats are sheared, and their wool is sold. Then the packs are filled with barley or corn, and the herd starts its long way back.

That's probably the last sheep train that will come down from the north. I also probably the last pack train of horses and mules carrying great bales of wool. This wool is the soft wool from the under-belly of the goat. It is the wool that is used to make the famous Kashmir scarves and shawls. It comes from only parts of Sinkiang and Tibet. None of this famous wool is now traveling to Kashmir; it is going east and west into Chinese and Russian markets. As long as China and Russia keep their hold on the northern country, it will never come south again.

MURROW: Central Asia is mostly in Russia and Tibet. But the northern stretch of India and the outposts along the Sinkiang-Tibetan border are also Central Asia. They are one world. The Communist regimes that lie to the north are a second world. We of the West, propelled by events so fast that we have little time to learn what we did yesterday or what we will do tomorrow, are still a third world. These worlds seem to be far apart. But it is important that we come to know them if we are to help find solutions to the tremendous revolutions that are sweeping Asia.

DOUGLAS: Today the Communist regimes have an upper hand in this region. But with small investments in understanding and friendship the influence can shift away from Russia to the West. Communism, with its cruel and exploitive character, does not carry the hopes of the people.

So far we have appeared in Asia largely as a strong military figure. If we want the allegiance of these people of Asia on our side, we must show more than strength. We must show friendship and understanding. We must avoid a bloody conflict between East and West. If Asia knew our friendship as well as our power, we could be wedded to her in great and noble deeds.

Once we were the champions of change, of liberation from usury, tyranny,

DOUGLAS: CONT'D disease and poverty. Throughout Asia our championship is being challenged. The appetite for change is there. The Communists are capturing and channeling it for their own aggressive ends. If we fail to meet this challenge ~~history~~ the Future will take its revenge.

Kunjva, my camp is in the plain of Chamba
Come at night time

9 MURROW: A bridge at Koksar had been washed out by a blizzard. The Chandra
55 sec. River which runs through the village, and its tributaries were swollen. Travelers were piled up there, waiting for the water to subside so that they could ford the river.

DOUGLAS: I suggested that we all build a bridge. A local Indian official whose duty it was to repair the bridge had logs; but he also had a price. I negotiated with him for several hours and got the price reduced from $25 to $5. Then I promised everyone who helped with the bridge a free passage over it.

Logs were snaked across the river. Flat slabs were laid over the logs.

These Himalayan streams are dangerous; they are not safe for man or beast. The natives believe there are angry spirits in the waters who take revenge on a man. Lives are often lost in their crossings. A good mule out there costs about $100; and that is a fortune to the

DOUGLAS: CONT'D average peasant.

10 DOUGLAS: 5 sec. There were streams we had to ford. The waters of one were so swift I was almost swept away.

11-17 MURROW: 53 sec. At the confluence of the Chandra and the Bagha Rivers, Justice Fouglas turned east, and came to the pleasant village of Kyelang, capital of Lahul — one of India's frontier provinces. Most of the Lahuli people are Buddhists; a small minority are of the Hindu faith. One can reach Lahul only four months out of the year; the rest of the time the passes are blocked by snow. There are no power plants, no electricity, no plumbing in Lahul. It is primitive country; all labor is by hand. Men work; but the main burden of the fields is carried by the women. These Lahuli women have Mongol features; they are mostly short and broad shouldered. They carry loads of grain and hay on their backs. They cultivate with a short-handled instrument that looks like a pick but has a broader blade. The men sit under a tree making sure the women work. The only work animal in this part of the world that is used on the farms is the dzo — a cross between a cow and a yak. Their long black hair is used to make the long black dresses the women wear. The people live mostly on barley — barley is their mainstay except for the milk and cheese from the dzo. Justice Douglas found another judge:

18 DOUGLAS: 43 sec.

Upstream from Kyelang at a village called Jispa, there was a local Indian judge holding court in the open. All of the peasants came out to watch the proceedings. These people had settled on government land illegally. They were squatters. They had paid no taxes; they had filed no homestead applications.

They are important people to India because they are on India's northern border. It's a nervous border where the Communist influence is strong. These people might be used by the Communists against India. That is why this kindly judge was gentle with these people - that is why he decided not to make them pay back taxes, nor to pay for the land. They were too poor to pay; the cash income per family is not $10 a year.

19 MURROW: 16 sec.

During a recess of the court some of the men sang a song of a girl who married and left Lahul. All girls want to leave Lahul; Lahul men make their women do all the work. The food in Lahul is monotonous. A girl who can escape to Kulu can have fruit to eat as well as barley.

1-4 DOUGLAS: 19 secs. Jispa, where the court was held, lies over 11,000 ft. From there the trail heads for Baralacha Pass. The last camp site is Zing Zing Bar over 13,000 ft. An old shelter there was crushed by snow. We camped in the ruins.

5-7 1 min. 5 secs. I left my porters at Koksar and hired mules. These mules -- eleven in all -- were hung with bells. Their owner was a young man -- Rup Singh. He had two assistants -- jovial, carefree youngsters. These mules stayed with me all the way to Leh, the end of the trek.

MURROW: The trail above Zing Zing Bar threads through great fields of broken shale rock. The ascent to Baralacha is steep and tireing. Below Baralacha is a blue and sterile lake -- Sun Lake, with no trees to mark its shores. Above this lake were huge drifts of soft snow. The snow blocked the trail -- and was too soft to hold a mule. Some of the smaller animals had to be repacked. Even the more rangy, robust ones foundered awkwardly in the drifts. Baralacha Pass is 16,200 ft. high -- a barren, rolling amphitheatre. The peaks that surround it are covered with snow and ice -- and from Baralacha look no higher than the mountains of New England. They MURROW (cont'd) are, however, 23,000 ft. peaks, shrunk to small ones when seen from this high pass.

8 19 secs. The valleys on the north side of Baralacha are mostly barren -- swept by wind, over-grazed by sheep and goats, and having little grass left.

These valleys lie between 14,000 and 15,000 ft. The night wind is cool, the sun is hot and burning -- burning fair-skinned people so that their eyes are swollen shut and their lips puffed and sore.

9-14 DOUGLAS: 1 min. Chakchu was one of our camps. It lies on a narrow ridge 15,800 ft. high. We put our bedrolls under a cliff. Our camp this night was a crow's nest.

We cooked on a two-burner kerosene stove. The muleteers made gur gur cha -- tea, salt, and yak butter -- the usual beverage with every meal in the Himalayas. If the butter is not rancid, it is quite palatable. And it is very nourishing.

At Chakchu I met up with a group of men and women who had walked from Leh to Manali -- 240 miles -- on a shopping trip. They were now on their return. One lady was in her 30's -- and she carried an eighty-pound pack. One lady in her 70's carried a forty-pound pack. This old lady -- with a head dress that made her look like DOUGLAS (cont'd) a wolf -- had a bad headache that night and was sick to her stomach.

MURROW:
15-16 22 secs. The trail beyond Chakchu keeps at 15,000 ft. for miles on end. The natives believe that each pass has a god who can strike men down. Those who are sick are thought to have incurred the wrath of the god.

When one crosses a pass safely he says a prayer in thankfulness. Each pass has a pile of stones -- a monument to the god of the pass. Each traveler adds a rock to the pile and often puts up a prayer flag.

DOUGLAS:
17 32 secs. The yak is the best possible transportation at high altitudes. He is a member of the ox family, with long hair that is usually black. I got yaks the day we had to travel 30 miles across the highest pass. That would have been too long a journey for the mules. Yaks are slow, averaging less than two miles an hour, but they are sure-footed as a goat and can carry up to 250 pounds with ease. The yak groans as he walks. He is the safest, the most reliable transportation in the Himalayes.

18-21 MURROW: 1 min. 24 secs.

The village of Gya lies on the north side of our highest pass. A small village of a few hundred people. The houses are typically Tibetan, with walls of rock stuck together with mud. The ceilings are low. The roofs are flat, the beams poplar wood -- (the only tree at this high altitude). The people are poor. Corn grows at the altitude of 12,000 feet -- but in Gya there is only one crop --- barley. It is the mainstay of the diet of the people. They have precious little meat. There are no schools. There are monasteries; but there are no churches, in the conventional sense. There are no hospitals and no doctors. The people live on the edge of misery and privation. They make their own clothes, the women spinning the yarn from the wool of sheep and the hair of yaks.

The women in Ladakh have a peculiar headdress known as the perakh. It is a piece of leather about two feet in length that comes from the forehead over the top of the head and down across the shoulders. The leather is studded with gems, usually turquoise and agate. It is a decorative headdress and highly prized. The most beautiful one in Ladakh is said to be owned by the Queen of Ladakh.

REEL III

1-5 MURROW: 2 min. 58 secs.

The monasteries own well over half of the farming land in Ladakh. The vast majority of the people of Ladakh either are attached to the monasteries as lamas, or work for the monasteries as farm tenants. The monasteries usually rent the land on shares.

Under Kashmir law no landlord can charge any interest on a loan to his tenant. But usury and extortionate credit practices have a deep hold on this country.

Kashmir passed a law restricting landowners to twelve acres each. The government took the rest and distributed it to the tenants. But it did not distribute the land holdings of the King of Ladakh, nor the land holdings of the monasteries.

The monasteries continue to own most of the land. The lamas are a powerful political force who have a strong position in the country.

The hold of the lamas on the people does not result from any organized activities of the church. The monasteries do not exert any power over the people through schools, hospitals, medical care, homes for the aged, and the like. They render very little community service to the people. When a person is sick a lama will be sent

MURROW: (Cont'd) to his bedside to pray for him. Lamas conduct funeral services. Lamas perform marriage ceremonies. The lamas keep their hold on the people by fears, superstitions, and poverty.

The peasant is illiterate. He has no radio to listen to the news of the world. He is filled with fears and superstitions, learns about the devils and demons from the lips of his parents when he is a babe. The lamas also indoctrinate him.

Each monasteryhas a spiritual head and another lama who is the managerial head. The managerial head has his staff of working monks who supervise the making of leases and the collection of rents. The business lama usually rides the biggest, whitest horse in the region. When he comes to a village to collect the rents, he brings with him more than the usual power and prestige of the landlord; he also brings the power and prestige of the church.

6-11 3 min. 40 secs. Upshi is the first village on the Indus River. Jigmet is the head man and the richest man in the village and owns a little more than an acre of land. He has no animals except a dzo and a few chickens. He is poor as a church mouse, but a very gracious host. Jigmet, like most Ladakhis, eats barley and an unleavened bread made

MURROW (Cont'd) from wheat. Like most other Ladakhis he lives at a bare subsistence level.

There are two schools of lamas in Ladakh. One is the Red Sect; the other is the Yellow Sect. The Yellow Sect is the reform sect, going back about 500 years. The Yellow Sect is the more powerful sect today. The head of the Buddhist world, the Dalai Lama who lives in Lhasa in Tibet, is a member of the Yellow Sect. Members of the Yellow Sect are always single men. They have a more strict discipline than the Red lama. The Red lama is permitted to marry, and some of them do.

These lamas look to the Dalai Lama in Tibet for their spiritual leadership. Many of them in fact go to Lhasa for years of study.

The Buddhists believe in the reincarnation of the soul. A man does not die; his soul merely leaves his body and takes possession of a new body. This is known as reincarnation. The man who has been an evil man in his lifetime may find that his soul moves not into a human body but into some animal on his death. Man's soul lives on and on, and the constant struggle through the centuries is for man to perfect himself, first by escaping from the animal kingdom and then by working himself up to the highest, the most

MURROW: (Cont'd) sublime form of life. The emphasis is on holiness, kindness, good deeds and the maintenance of a peaceful and righteous life.

This doctrine of reincarnation has taken a special twist in Tibet. It has been used since about the 15th century to maintain the authority of the priesthood and to perpetuate the power of the lamas. The Chinese used it in order to control the selection of the Dalai Lama. And it has been used for some centuries for the selection of lesser lamas as well. For example, the head of every monastery is the reincarnation of the holy man who originally established the monastery.

That is true of the Rinpoche, the boy of eleven at the Hemis Monastery. When the soul of his predecessor departed, the lamas of the monastery went to Lhasa in Tibet to consult the oracle; and the oracle told how the reincarnated lama could be found in a remote province in Tibet. The lamas went there and found the boy. They satisfied themselves by various tests that the boy was the reincarnation of the former head of the monastery. He was brought back to the monastery and until he reaches his maturity is under the supervision of his teacher, a man by the name of Phuntsog.

12-13 DOUGLAS: 30 Secs.

I stopped at Hemis and visited with the Rinpoche. This boy of eleven will now go to Lhasa for ten years of study. Lhasa is now the stronghold of Red Chinese influence. Will this boy come back indoctrinated in Communist philosophy? This is a question that bothers the priesthood of the Buddhis world these days. The Communists now control the hierachy of the church and the selection of all the chief lamas. Whether they will succeed in making the church a mouthpiece for them is a question yet to be answered. Only time will tell.

1 min. 20 secs.

At Hemis I saw the lama dances. They are done on festive occasions. The peasants come from far and wide to see the dances. The orchestra is made up of drums, cymbals and horns. Two huge horns dominate the music. They are twelve feet long. They are blown from the top of the monastery in the morning to wake the monks and at night to put the monastery to bed. They can be heard for twenty miles.

The dancers are lamas. Their costumes are hundreds of years old. The masks are carved from single pieces of wood and enameled by an ancient process. The dances represent the struggle between Good and Evil. Evil is represented by ugly characters — Anger, Lust, and Greed. These characters are the ones that beset man throughout his life. If he escapes them, and prevails over them, he wins merit and advances to a higher class in the next life. If he is a victim of them, he loses merit and slips down the ladder in the next life. The audience can see these spirits and the struggle of man against the evil ones.

DOUGLAS:
CONT'D

The good spirits are represented by the stag and the yak. These spirits are kind and friendly to man. They are on his side in the struggle against evil. And always in these lama dances, the outcome is the same. The Stag and the Yak route Anger, Lust, and Greed. Good conquers Evil.

Thus does the monastery bring a moral lesson home to every peasant.

REEL IV

1 MURROW: 30 Secs. Even though the lamas hold the people in poverty and ignorance, there is no revolt and apparently not even any resentment. Yet people are people the world around, and the Ladakhis show their resentment in simple, innocuous ways. It is in the form of making fun of the lamas. This is all in good taste, and one of the most dramatic ways is the singing of a famous folk song. The song is a take-off on a man accused of being a lama. As the women sing, they bend over, shaking their fingers at an imaginary figure at their feet as though they are scolding. And as they sing, their eyes dance with merriment, for now they are making fun of their lord and master, the one who owns their souls, their houses, their fields -- the big, rich monastery that sits like a castle on the hill.

2 DOUGLAS: 15 1/2 Secs. These lamas are devout men. They spend their days from morning to night in prayer and meditation. Very often they sit for days on end reciting scriptures out loud. Sometimes they sit and say their prayers in unison. On a holy day at the beginning of each

DOUGLAS: (Cont'd) year, the entire monastery recites the scriptures out loud.

3-5 MURROW: 51 Secs. After leaving Hemis Monastery, Justice Douglas met the Indus River, a big river that rises in Tibet, flows through northern India, cuts through the Himalayas, and comes out into Pakistan. The water rights of this river constitute one of the grievances in the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan. There is some irrigation from the river. But most of the systems are ancient and inefficient. The present Indian Government has vast irrigation projects planned for this region.

There are some camels in this region, but most of the transport is by the small Tibetan pony and by mules and yaks. There are no trade routes that run the length of the Indus River; but most of the trade routes cut across it. These are the ancient caravan trails coming down from Tibet and Sinkiang into India. The trail from Manali to Leh was one of those routes.

6 6 Secs. Indian army patrols ride this remote Himalayan country looking for bandits and for Red Chinese.

7 DOUGLAS: 35 1/2 Secs. The mani wall is made of rocks. The rocks on the top of the mani wall are flat slabs on each of which is engraved the magic words, om mani padme hoom. It means "Oh, jewel of the lotus". The lotus, grows out of mud and filth. Buddha was born out of the lotus. Buddha, like the lotus, showed that the spirit of man can find perfection even among the dregs of the earth.

One who passes a mani wall keeps it on his right, for there is an Tibetan saying, "Beware of the devils on the left hand side". The chherten is a monument of pyramid design, usually whitewashed, that contain the ashes of a deceased. There is usually one at the entrance of a village. They guard the village, keeping the evil spirits away.

8 22 1/2 Secs. Ladakh is one of the few remaining places in the world where a woman can have more than one lawful husband. I visited some of these families. When the oldest brother marries, his wife becomes the wife of all the brothers. The monasteries encourage this practice. Kashmir opposes it. The effect of polyandry is to keep the population from increasing in an area where the food

9-14 MURROW: 2 min. 15 Sec.

Leh, the capital of Ladakh, is a town of 4,000. It lies 11,500 ft. high in a vast sloping basin hemmed by 25,000 ft. peaks. Leh has narrow winding streets made for caravans, not cars. Leh has no cars except a few jeeps of the Indian Army garrison nearby. The main bazaars in Leh are located on a long L-shaped street. Each shop is flush with the street. At one end of the main street is a mosque to accommodate the religious needs of a small minority of Moslems in this region. Leh is a peaceful town. Buddha taught the principles of non-violence, and it has had such an effect on the people that even in the hurley-burley of the city of Leh, there have been in recent years no records of any crime of violence and very few thefts.

Leh is on an ancient caravan route that leads to Yarkand in Sinkiang and Lhasa in Tibet. Wool, tea, skins, carpets, borax, salt came down from the north. Cotton goods, opium, pearls, spices, wheat, tobacco came up from the south. These caravans met at Leh and exchanges were made. Great commerce and industry flourished.

MURROW: (Cont'd) Leh was indeed the great connecting link between the cold and forbidden land of the north and the warm and sunny land of the south. Today people still swarm through the bazaar of Leh as they did before. A few of the shops are still open. But the ancient hum of the market is gone. Many of the stores are closed. The heavy wooden doors of the shops have been swung shut, and fastened with padlocks. Only a trickle of trade now comes down from the north. The Russians have closed the Sinkiang border. A depression has struck Leh. This is not a temporary depression. It is permanent because Russia has blocked the trade routes that run north and south. Now they will run east and west. Russia will use the commerce of China, Tibet, and Sinkiang to lace those three regions tightly into the Soviet empire. This is a part of the Soviet empire building.

High above Leh, and looking down upon it, is the ancient castle of the King of Ladakh. It rises many stories like an awkward sky-scraper. Once it was a place of splendor. Now it is empty, filled with cobwebs, bats and the memories of an ancient power. The King of Ladakh, a young man in his 20's, is now an officer in the Indian Army. The rule of the kings is ended. The Kashmir Government now makes the laws for this region.

15-17 DOUGLAS: When I was at Leh I saw what probably were the last of the caravans

coming down from the north. The first of these were sheep. There is an old Tibetan saying that "sheep are the goods trains." Sheep and goats have been used from time immemorial to bring produce down from the north. The sheep are loaded with pack bags full of salt. They start down from the north in June and travel hundreds of miles, grazing as they go. When they reach their destination, the packs are removed and the salt sold. Then the sheep and the goats are sheared, and their wool is sold. Then the packs are filled with barley or corn, and the herd starts its long way back.

I saw probably the last sheep train that will come down from the north. I saw also probably the last pack train of horses and mules carrying great bales of wool. This wool is the soft wool from the under-belly of the goat. It is the wool that is used to make the famous Kashmir scarves and shawls. It comes from only parts of Sinkiang and Tibet. None of this famous wool is now traveling to Kashmir; it is going east and west into Chinese and Russian markets. As long as China and Russia keep their hold on the northern country, it will never come south again.

MURROW: Central Asia is mostly in Russia and Tibet. But the northern stretch of India and the outposts along the Sinkiang-Tibetan border are also Central Asia. They are one world. The Communist regimes that lie to the north are a second world. We of the West, propelled by events so fast that we have little time to learn what we did yesterday or what we will do tomorrow, are still a third world. These worlds seem to be far apart. But it is important that we come to know them if we are to help find solutions to the tremendous revolutions that are sweeping Asia.

DOUGLAS: Today the Communist regimes have an upper hand in this region. But with small investments in understanding and friendship the influence can shift away from Russia to the West. Communism, with its cruel and exploitive character, does not carry the hopes of the people.

So far we have appeared in Asia largely as a strong military figure. If we want the allegiance of these people of Asia on our side, we must show more than strength. We must show friendship and understanding. We must avoid a bloody conflict between East and West. If Asia knew our friendship as well as our power, we could be wedded to her in great and noble deeds.

Once we were the champions of change, of liberation from usury, tyranny, disease and poverty. Throughout Asia our championship is being challenged. The appetite for change is there. The Communists are capturing and channeling it for their own aggressive ends. If we fail to meet this challenge history will take its revenge.

Introduction

This is a story of Central Asia – one of the most remote, one of the least known areas of the world. Yet today it is a ~~one of the most~~ critical ~~areas~~ region. Justice Bill Douglas has been there. He recently crossed the Himalayas and has brought us the story of Central Asia ~~in pictures~~.

50 seconds

I should start this story with the words Jai Ho for those are the words of greeting along the trails of the Himalayas.

D//

~~INTRODUCTION~~

~~Su Le is the word of greeting along the trails of India's Himalayas.~~ The Himalayas are the highest mountains in the world. They form ~~an enormous~~ the great barricade, that runs ~~northwest and southeast~~ across northern India and Pakistan. ~~Their highest peak is Everest -- 29,141 ft.; it and many other mountains in the range have never been climbed by man.~~

Even the passes ~~-- the low saddles in the range~~ -- are high by American standards. ~~The lowest pass is about 13,000 ft., the highest over 18,000 ft.,~~ The average pass is ~~15,000 or 16,000 ft.~~ -- higher than any mountain in the United States except McKinley in Alaska. These passes lead from India and Pakistan into the countries to the north.

The northern countries are Tibet and Sinkiang. Tibet has recently been taken over by ~~Communists from~~ Red China. Sinkiang ~~is ancient Chinese Turkestan and still~~ is Chinese territory. But Soviet Russia has moved in ~~to Sinkiang~~ with a modern industrial ~~development~~ program. Soviet money, ~~Soviet~~ Soviet technicians, Soviet planning now dominate Sinkiang.

There are great tensions inside Tibet and inside Sinkiang. In Tibet the Buddhist Church is opposed to the Communist regime; and the Communists are starting a program of political action to break the influence and prestige of the church.

~~One who crosses~~ North of the ~~high~~ Himalayas ~~in the western part of the range comes out in Tibet. If he crosses the central part of the range, he comes out in Ladakh, which~~ is Ladakh which lies against the border of Tibet and Sinkiang. ~~In history~~ most of its people ~~are~~ have been tied to Tibet ~~through~~ by books Ladakh is known as Little Tibet. The people, their ~~racial characteristics, their language and culture, their religion are Tibetan. They have been tied closely to Tibet and Sinkiang in trade and commerce that have moved for centuries over ancient caravan routes. But~~ race, religion and trade. They are politically ~~ties are with~~ a part of India, ~~not with Tibet or Sinkiang.~~

Along the border one can feel the pressure of Communist activity and come to know the nature of Communist propaganda in Central Asia. ~~Central Asia is a critical area. It now~~ has airports from which Soviet airplanes can pound India. It is rich in minerals. Tibet -- the heart of Central Asia -- is the home of the Buddhist world. It is there that the Dalai Lama lives, the spiritual head of the church. It is there that the Communists work these days to gain the upper political hand. If they can get control of the church and make it a puppet in their cause, they will spread their influence far and wide.

The story of these political maneuvers is a part of the reward for crossing the high Himalayas. ~~into Ladakh~~ There are other rewards of adventure along the trail.

1 minute 11 seconds

The trek starts at Manali in Punjab, India. ~~We reach Manali, the starting point of the trek, by train. The train crosses the hot flat plains of India where teeming millions work a tired soil trying to eke out a living.~~ Manali is at the head of the beautiful Kulu Valley.

~~The northern valleys of India have fewer people per square mile than the plains.~~ The mountain valleys grow fruit, tea, rice, and corn. These valleys ~~-- around 6,000 ft. high,~~ are inhabited mostly by Hindus ~~who till the soil, run caravans of horses and mules over the Himalayas to northern trading posts, or manage small retail shops.~~

They are simple, friendly people who live in a world where superstition flourishes. Each valley has a god or goddess, who is the guardian of the welfare of the people. When plague or sickness strikes a village, the villagers under the leadership of the priests pray to the deities and make them offerings. When there is drought and crops are threatened, they also pray to the god or goddess. In Manali the goddess is Hirma. When I arrived the corn was turning yellow for lack of water. The villagers prayed for rain and as part of their program put on strange dances -- one of which was the sword dance.

Their orchestra -- made up of men from the Untouchable Caste -- played drums and flutes for hours on end while the villagers watched. In a few hours their prayers were answered. It rained. The rain came in torrents.

~~By that time we were on the trail, lightly dressed -- our rubber ponchos packed. We were soaked through in a few minutes. Then the rain turned to sleet and snow and the wind came with fury.~~ I had twenty porters carrying 900 lbs.

of camp equipment. In addition I had a cook, an assistant, and an interpreter. All of us survived the storm. But death rode on its wings.

Higher up -- a few miles beyond us in the stretch we were to cover in the next day or two -- the storm was so severe it killed ~~hundreds of~~ ponies, ~~and~~ mules, and cattle ~~and cattle.~~

3-7 The trail above Manali leads toward the Rothang Pass which means the Pass of Death. The mountain peaks around Rothang Pass are 23,000 to 25,000 ft. high. Timberline goes close to 13,000 ft.

1 minute 48 seconds

~~On the climb to Rothang we left the chestnut trees at 8,000 ft. and the fir and spruce at 10,000; then we picked up scatterings of birch, juniper, and the thick, bushy rhododendron.~~

The slopes of the Himalayas above 10,000 ft. hold many wide green basins, ideal for the grazing of sheep and goats. ~~There are great quantities of buttercups, phlox, anemones, poppies, geraniums, and cinquefoil on these slopes. Fifty thousand sheep and goats cross Rothang Pass every year en route to grazing lands high on the other side.~~

~~This trail also sees many caravans bringing salt, wool, and skins down from the north and taking cloth, sugar, and spices up from the south.~~ The trail is centuries old, and follows an easy grade. The Himalayas are full of slate rock that chips off into flat slabs. The men who have traveled this trail have laid these slabs in the trail. The effect in many stretches is that of a wide, easy staircase which, except for the altitude, is easy to climb.

~~My~~ The porters stopped frequently to rest and smoke. They were a friendly lot -- and very gay and happy now that their prayers for rain had been answered.

~~At Koti -- the last village below Rothang Pass -- we bought a chicken from a farmer; and we carried it over Rothang Pass on our packs and had it for dinner that night.~~

The top of Rothang -- 13,200 ft. high -- was covered with fresh snow from the blizzard ~~we had encountered.~~ Remnants of the storm still hovered over the pass; a raw, cold wind blew there.

There are many waterfalls around Rothang Pass -- some higher and more vivid than those of our own Columbia River Gorge. One of the largest looks like a bridal veil and is so remote that in all the centuries its music has probably seldom been heard by human ears.

Koksar is the first village on the north side of Rothang Pass. It was here that Rahul -- ~~my~~ the interpreter -- met up with the first of many Buddhist lamas ~~we saw~~. This lama -- like the lama in Kipling's book Kim -- was on a pilgrimage.

8. There were Hindu women from Kulu along the trail. They were pretty -- dark skin, sharp features, brown eyes, white teeth. ~~They wore colored scarves over their heads. Their skirts were full. Some were barefoot; most of them wore sandals. They all wore earrings -- some had as many as 10~~

i~~n each ear~~. Their noses were pierced and set with gold pieces. Most of them wore bracelets and anklets. They sang of love -- a song about Kunjva. It went like this:

Red, red wrist
Gold watch on wrist
Kunjva, my camp is in the plain of Chamba
Come at night time

White, white your teeth
Red lips, sweet your tongue
Kunjva, my camp is in the plain of Chamba
Come at night time

9. ~~I had to build a bridge at Koksar.~~ The Chandra River which runs through the villages and ~~one of~~ its ~~main~~ tributaries ~~comes in~~ where ~~there~~. A bridge at Koksar had been washed out by ~~the~~ a blizzard ~~we were in.~~ I ~~found about 30~~ travelers were piled up ~~at Koksar~~ there, waiting for the water to subside so that they could ford the river.

55 seconds

9. ~~I~~ suggested that ~~we all~~ ~~they~~ we all build a bridge. ~~Everyone else thought it was cheaper to wait.~~ I ~~looked for trees to cut. There were none except 2,000 to 3,000 feet high on the canyon wall.~~ A local Indian official whose duty it was to repair the bridge had logs; but he also had a price. I negotiated with him for several hours and got the price reduced from $25 to $5. Then I promised everyone who helped with the bridge a free passage over it.

~~It was shortly finished~~ -- ~~F~~lat ~~slate~~ slabs were laid over the logs.

logs were snaked across the river.

These Himalayan streams are dangerous, ~~when swollen~~. They are not safe for man or beast. The natives believe there are angry spirits in the waters who take revenge on a man. Lives are often lost in their crossings. A good mule out there costs about $100; and that is a fortune to the average peasant.

10. There were streams we had to ford. The waters of one were so swift I was almost swept away. ~~I was caught just in time by a local Lahuli man who was wiser about the danger of these streams than I. He dragged me to shore; and he and I helped a dozen or more other people across. There were two ladies and a baby whom we helped. Small mules and donkeys had to be unpacked before they could cross~~.

5 seconds

We followed the Chandra downstream for about 15 miles. High above us were 20,000 ft., snow-capped peaks. Below them were grassy basins and slopes where sheep grazed. But the valley is barren in summer -- rocks and sand with few places left for cultivation.

11-17. At the confluence of the Chandra and the Bagha rivers ~~we~~ Justice Douglas turned east and came to the pleasant village of Kyelang, capital of Lahul -- one of India's frontier provinces. Most of the Lahuli people are Buddhists; a small minority are of the Hindu faith. One can reach Lahul only four months out of the year; the rest of the time the passes are blocked by snow. There are no power plants, no electricity, no plumbing in Lahul. It is primitive country; all labor is by hand. Men work; but the main burden of the fields is carried by the women.

These Lahuli women have Mongol features; they are mostly short and broad shouldred. They carry loads of grain and hay on their backs. They cultivate with a short handled instrument that looks like a pick but has a broader blade. Some~~times the men join them in the fields -- especially when their picture is being taken. But mostly~~ The men sit under a tree -- ~~serving in a supervisory role~~ making sure the women work. The only work animal in this part of the world that is used on the farms is the dzo -- a cross between a cow and a yak. Their long black hair is used to make the long black dresses the women wear. The people live mostly on barley -- barley is their mainstay except for the milk and cheese from the dzo. -- Justice Douglass found another Judge!

18. Upstream from Kyelang at a village called Jispa ~~I found~~ there was a local Indian judge holding court in the open. All of the peasants came out to watch the proceedings. -- ~~the old and the young, the men and the women.~~ These people had settled on government land illegally. They were squatters. They had paid no taxes; they had filed no homestead applications.

They are important people to India because they are on India's northern border. It's ~~is~~ a nervous border where the Communist influence is strong. These people might be used by the Communists against India. That is why this kindly judge was gentle with these people. ~~"Will you eject them from this government land?" I asked. "Certainly not," he said. "They are border people who must be happy and content or else they may be used by the Communists against India's interests." "Will you make them pay back taxes? Will you make them pay for the land?" I asked. "They are too poor to pay," he replied. And then he~~

He said they were ~~must be~~ ~~Therefore~~ ~~That is why the judge decided not to~~ ~~Hearing~~ ~~Heard~~ ~~That's why~~ ~~That's why he~~ added, "The cash income of any of these families, probably not $10 a year."

19. During a recess of the court some of the men sang. They sang a song of Angmo, a girl who married a man and left Lahul. All girls want to leave Lahul. No outside woman wants to marry a Lahuli man. The reasons? First, Lahuli men make their women do all the work. Second, The food in Lahul is pretty monotonous. A girl who can escape to Kulu -- and many do -- can have fruit to eat as well as barley -- fruit, and rice, and lamb.

REEL II

1. (Sheep scene should be moved near the end of Reel IV.)

1-4. Jispa, where the court was held, lies over 11,000 ft. high. From there the trail heads for Baralacha Pass, almost 17,000 ft. high. It follows the Bagha River all the way. The last camp site is Zing Zing Bar over 13,000 ft. There used to be a shelter there; but heavy snows crushed it. We camped there in the ruins. We got a late start in the morning because the mules went to 16,000 ft. or more looking for feed, and it took hours to catch them.

5-7. These mules -- eleven in all -- were hung with bells. Their owner was a young man -- Rup Singh. He had two assistants -- jovial, carefree youngsters. We got these mules in Kyelang, sending our porters back to Manali. These mules stayed with me all the way to Leh, the end of the trek.

7. The trail above Zing Zing Bar threads through great fields of broken shale rock. The ascent to Baralacha ~~Pass~~ ~~was~~ is steep and tiring. Below Baralacha ~~Pass~~ is a blue and sterile lake -- Sun Lake, with no grass or trees to mark its shores. Above this lake were huge drifts of soft snow. The snow blocked the trail -- and was too soft to hold a mule. Some of the smaller animals had to be repacked. Even the more rangy, robust ones foundered awkwardly in the drifts. ~~One got stuck and in his violent struggle cut his head on the corner of a pack box, leaving an ugly wound.~~

Baralacha Pass is 16,800 ft. high -- a barren, rolling amphitheatre. ~~This day it was touched with snow and wet.~~ The peaks that surround it are covered with snow and ice -- and from Baralacha look no higher than the mountains of New England. They are 23,000 ft. ~~peaks~~ barrier, shrunk to small ones when seen from ~~Baralacha.~~ this high pass. high Pass

These valleys lie between 14,000 and 15,000 ft. The night wind is cool, the sun is hot and burning -- burning fair-skinned people so that their eyes are swollen shut and their lips puffed and sore.

9-14. ~~Some of the trails climbed steeply.~~ Chakchu was one of our camps. It lies on a narrow ridge 15,800 ft. high. We put our bedrolls under a cliff. Our camp this night was ~~indeed~~ a crow's nest.

We cooked on a two-burner kerosene stove. The muleteers made gur gur cha -- tea, salt, and yak butter. ~~This is~~ the usual beverage with every meal in the Himalayas. If the butter is not rancid, it is quite palatable. And it is very nourishing.

At Chakchu I met up with a group of men and women who had walked from Leh to Manali -- 240 miles -- on a shopping trip. They were now on their return. One lady was in her 30's -- and she carried an eighty-pound pack. One lady in her 70's carried a forty-pound pack. This old lady -- with a head dress that made her look like a wolf -- had a bad headache that night and was sick to her stomach. ~~I gave her medicine; and in the morning she was well again.~~

15-16. ~~The trail beyond Chakchu keeps at 15,000 ft. for miles on end. The mountains are dry and barren. High up are ibex, blue sheep and wild asses. There are three more passes to cross -- passes that rise to 17,479 ft.~~

17. The yak is the best possible transportation at high altitudes. ~~The yak~~ It is a member of the ox family with long hair that is usually black. I got yaks the day we had to travel 30 miles across the highest pass. That would have been too long a journey for the mules. Yaks are slow ~~animals~~, averaging less than two miles an hour, but they are ~~as~~ sure-footed as a goat and can carry up to 250 pounds with ease. The yak groans as he walks, ~~and there always seems to be blood dripping from his nose. But~~ He is ~~very~~ the safest, the most reliable transport in the Himalayas.

18-21. The village of Gya lies on the north side of our highest pass. ~~It is~~ a small village of a few hundred people. The houses are typically Tibetan with walls of rock stuck together with mud. The ceilings are low. The roofs are flat, the beams ~~being~~ poplar wood -- (the only tree at this high altitude.) The people are poor, ~~having cash income per family of not more than $10 a year. In some valleys~~ Corn grows at the altitude of ~~up to~~ 12,000 feet. But in Gya there is only one crop; ~~that is~~ barley. It is the mainstay of the diet of the people. They have precious little meat. There are no schools ~~in this region~~. There are monasteries; but there are no churches in the conventional sense. There are no hospitals and no doctors. The people live on the edge of misery and privation. They make their own clothes, the women spinning the yarn from the wool of sheep and hair of yaks.

The women in Ladakh have a peculiar headdress known as the perakh. It is a piece of leather about two feet in length that comes from the forehead over the top of the head and down across the shoulders. The leather is studded with gems, usually turquoise and agate. It is a ~~highly~~ decorative headdress and highly prized. The most beautiful one in Ladakh is said to be owned by the Queen of Ladakh.

REEL III

1-5. ~~The land in Ladakh is owned mostly by the monasteries.~~ The monasteries own well over half ~~50%~~ of the farming land in Ladakh ~~and the land that they own is the best land.~~ The vast majority of the people of Ladakh either are attached to the monasteries as lamas, or work for the monasteries as farm tenants. The monasteries usually rent the land ~~sometimes~~ on shares, ~~sometimes for cash~~. ~~The monasteries are also the source of credit for the tenant.~~

~~Kashmir today has a liberal government. It has liberal laws governing agricultural credit.~~ Under Kashmir law no ~~No~~ landlord can ~~now~~ charge any interest on a loan to his tenant, and ~~Money lenders today are restricted to 5% on their loans~~. But usury ~~and extortionate credit practices have~~ and extortionate credit practices have a deep hold on this country. ~~Ancient habits are hard to break. Ladakh is full of ugly stories about current usurious practices.~~

Kashmir ~~also has a law breaking up its ancient feudal system.~~ passed a law restricting ~~Under its new law every~~ landowners ~~is entitled to keep only about~~ to twelve acres ~~of land~~ each. The government ~~has taken~~ took the ~~last~~ rest of ~~the holdings~~ and distributed it to the tenants. ~~In the vicinity of Leh over 20,000 acres passed from 24 landlords to the tenants. This distribution was free, the peasants not paying~~ for the land; nor to date has the government given the owners any compensation. Whether or not the landlords should be paid is a political question that agitates Kashmir today. But in two important respects, Kashmir has not touched the central ~~land problem of Ladakh. It has~~ But it did not distribute the land holdings of the King of Ladakh, ~~who owns a large acreage, nor has it touched~~ nor the land holdings of the monasteries.

The monasteries ~~therefore~~ continue to own most of the land ~~in Ladakh in spite of Kashmir's new policy.~~ The monasteries ~~have been excluded because of the power of the lamas and because the government did not deem it expedient to disturb the status quo.~~ The lamas are a powerful political force, who ~~They~~ have a strong position in the ~~community~~ country. The hold of the lamas on the people does not result from any organized activities of the church. ~~There are few schools run by the monasteries. The monasteries have instruction in philosophy, astronomy, literature, and religion. But that instruction is for the lamas, not the laymen. Children are not taken~~ under the wing and indoctrinated. The monasteries do not exert any power over the people through schools, hospitals, medical care, homes for the aged, and the like. They render very little community service to the people. When a person is sick a lama will be sent to his bedside ~~to that the lama may~~ pray for him. Lamas conduct funeral services. Lamas perform marriage ceremonies. ~~But~~ the lamas keep their hold on the people by fears, superstitions, and poverty. ~~The lama is the person who has command over the spirit world, who can drive away the evil forces, who can influence the good ones to help the people.~~

~~The lama has contact with the other world. He has the wisdom and power of the land.~~ The peasant is illiterate. ~~He can neither read nor write.~~ He has no radio to listen to the news of the world. ~~The peasant~~ He is, filled with fears and superstitions, learns about the devils and demons from the lips of his parents when he is a babe, ~~from the stories his elders tell as he grows up~~. The lamas also indoctrinate him ~~with fears and superstitions~~. ~~They teach that the devils are always present. Lamaism has a vested interest in the ignorance of the peasant and in the poverty of the peasant as well. Poverty and ignorance in fact go hand in hand. Poverty, indeed, is the main instrument for perpetuating and promoting ignorance.~~

Each monastery has a spiritual head, and another lama who is the managerial head. The managerial head has his staff of working monks who supervise the making of leases~~, the cultivation of the lands of the monasteries,~~ and the collection of rents. The business lama usually rides the biggest, whitest horse in the region. When he comes to a village to collect the rents, he brings with him more than the usual power and prestige of the landlord; he also brings the power and prestige of the church.

6-11. Upshi is ~~the first~~ village on the Indus River, ~~that we reached~~. We stayed ~~with Jigmet~~, the head man ~~of the village~~. Jigmet, ~~the~~ richest man in the village, and owns a little more than an acre of land. He has no animals except a dzo and a few chickens. He is poor as a church mouse, but a very gracious host. Jigmet, like most Ladakhis, eats barley and ~~wheat cakes called chappatis,~~ an unleavened bread made from wheat, ~~He bakes barley flour and stirs it in his tea. He drinks the broth of turnips that may have some peas in it. He has fruits in season -- apples, grapes, and apricots. But he has precious little meat. Jigmet,~~ like most other Ladakhis, he lives at a bare subsistence level.

There are two schools of lamas in Ladakh. One is the Red Sect; the other is the Yellow Sect. The Yellow Sect is the reform sect, going back about 500 years. The Yellow Sect is the more powerful sect today. The head of the Buddhist world, the Dalai Lama who lives in Lhasa in Tibet, is a member of the Yellow Sect. Members of the Yellow Sect are always single men. They have a more strict discipline than the Red lama. The Red lama is permitted to marry, and some of them do.

These lamas look to the Dalai Lama in Tibet for their spiritual leadership. Many of them in fact go to ~~study in~~ Lhasa for years of study. ~~They come back from Lhasa indoctrinated in the Buddhist faith and in its philosophy and literature.~~

The Buddhists believe in the reincarnation of the soul. A man does not die; his soul merely leaves his body and takes possession of a new body. This is known as reincarnation. The man who has been an evil man in his lifetime may find that his soul moves not into a human body but into some animal on his death. Man's soul lives on and on, and the constant struggle through the centuries is for man to perfect himself, first by escaping from the animal kingdom and then by working himself up to the highest, the most sublime form of life. The emphasis is on holiness, kindness, good deeds, and the maintenance of a peaceful and righteous life.

This doctrine of reincarnation has taken a special twist in Tibet. It has been used since about the 15th century to maintain the authority of the priesthood and to perpetuate the power of the lamas. The Chinese used it in order to control the selection of the Dalai Lama. And it has been used for some centuries for the selection of lesser lamas as well. For example, the head of every monastery is the reincarnation of the holy man who originally established the monastery. That is true of the Rinpoche, ~~the~~ a boy of eleven ~~with whom I stayed~~ at the Hemis Monastery. When the soul of his predecessor departed, the lamas of the monastery went to Lhasa in Tibet to consult the oracle; and the oracle told how the reincarnated lama could be found in a remote province in Tibet. The lamas went there and found the boy. They satisfied themselves by various tests that the boy was the reincarnation of the former head of the monastery. He was brought back to the monastery and is under the supervision of his teacher, a man ~~by~~ the name of Phuntzog, until he reaches his maturity.

12-13. I stopped at Hemis ~~Monastery for two days~~ and visited with the Rinpoche ~~and Phuntzog, his teacher~~. This boy of eleven will now go to Lhasa for ten years of study. Lhasa is now the stronghold of Red Chinese influence. Will this boy come back indoctrinated in Communist philosophy? ~~Will he return hostile to the West, friendly to Russia?~~ The~~se~~ ~~are~~ is questions that bothers the priesthood of the Buddhist world these days. ~~When Red China got control of Tibet she won a political victory that may have repercussions far beyond the Tibetan border.~~ ~~Now~~ The Communists ~~have some~~ now control ~~over~~ the hierarchy of the church. ~~They will now control the oracle who determines where the souls of the deceased lamas have gone. With that power they will control~~ the selection of all the chief lamas, ~~in northern India.~~ Whether they will succeed in making the church a mouthpiece for them, ~~whether the priests will be able to resist, whether the Communists will confiscate the wealth of the monasteries and break the power of the lamas -- these are all~~ is a questions yet to be answered. Only time will tell.

30 seconds

14-17 At Hemis I saw the lama dances. They are done on festive occasions. The pilgrims come from far and wide to see these dances. The orchestra is made up of drums, cymbals and horns. Two huge horns dominate the music. They are twelve feet long. They are blown from the top of the monastery in the morning to wake the monks and at night to put the monastery to bed. They can be heard for twenty miles.

1 minute 20 seconds

The dancers are lamas. Their costumes are hundreds of years old. The masks are carved from ~~one piece~~ single pieces of wood and enameled by an ancient process. The dances represent the struggle between Good and Evil. Evil is represented by ugly characters -- Anger, Lust, and Greed. These characters are the ones that bes~~t~~ man throughout his life. If he escapes them, and prevails over them, he wins merit and advances to a higher class in the next life. If he is a victim of them, he loses merit and slips down the ladder in the next life.

~~The peasants come in from far and wide to see these dances. There they~~ The audience can see ~~the evil~~ there spirits ~~and the good ones. There They can see~~ and the struggle of man against the evil ones.

The good spirits are represented by the stag and the yak. These spirits are kind and friendly to man. They are on his side in the struggle against evil. And always in these lama dances, the outcome is the same. The Stag and the Yak route Anger, Lust, and Greed. Good conquers Evil.

Thus does the monastery bring a moral lesson home to every peasant.

REEL IV

~~1.~~ Even though the lamas hold the people in poverty and ignorance, there is no revolt and apparently not even any resentment. ~~The hold of the lamas is great for, as expressed in a Tibetan proverb, "without a lama in front there is no approach to God."~~ Yet people are people the world around, and the Ladakhis show their resentment in simple, innocuous ways. It is in the form of making fun of the lamas. This is all in good taste, and one of the most dramatic ways is the singing of a famous ~~Ladakhi~~ folk song. ~~The women of Gya sang it for me.~~ The song is a take-off on a man accused of being a lama. As the women sing, they bend over, shaking their fingers at an imaginary figure at their feet as though they ~~were~~ are scolding. And as they sing, their eyes danced with merriment, for now they ~~were~~ are making fun of their lord and master, the one who owns their souls, their houses, their fields -- the big, rich monastery that sits like a castle on the hill.

1. ~~the~~ 39 seconds

2. These lamas are devout men. They spend their days from morning to night in prayer and meditation. Very often they sit for days on end ~~in the woods by themselves,~~ reciting scriptures out loud. Sometimes they sit and say their prayers in unison. On a holy day at the beginning of each year, the entire monastery recites out loud the scriptures ~~the entire Buddhist scriptures~~.

15½ seconds

3-5. After ~~we left~~ leaving Hemis Monastery ~~we~~ Justice Douglas - met the Indus River, a big river that rises in Tibet, flows through northern India, cuts through the Himalayas, and comes out into Pakistan. The water rights of this river constitute one of the grievances in the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan. There is some irrigation from the river. But most of the systems are ancient and inefficient. The present Indian Government has vast irrigation projects planned for this region.

There are some camels in this region, but most of the transport is by the small Tibetan pony and by mules and yaks.

There are no trade routes that run the length of the Indus River; but most of the trade routes cut across it. These are the ancient caravan trails coming down from Tibet and Sinkiang into India. The trail ~~that I followed~~ from Manali to Leh was one of those routes.

6~~4~~. When I had left New Delhi, the movie film which I had sent out from America had not arrived. I did not have the time to wait for it. Prime Minister Nehru of India told me not to worry~~, that he~~ would get it to me. And it was ~~delivered~~ in ~~the middle of my trek~~ ~~In a very remote place in the Himalayas~~ ~~by some of the~~ Indian army patrols ~~who~~ ride this remote Himalayan ~~northern~~ country looking for bandits and for Red Chinese.

7. ~~As we approach Leh, capital of Ladakh and the end of the trail, we see some of the longest mani walls in the world.~~ The mani wall is ~~a rock~~ made of rocks. ~~They are usually eight feet or more tall and twenty-five feet or more wide~~. ~~There is one near Leh that runs for about a mile~~. The rocks on the top of the mani wall are flat slabs on each of which is engraved the magic words, om mani padme hoom. It means "Oh, jewel of the lotus". The lotus, ~~the most beautiful of flowers~~, grows out of mud and filth. Buddha was born out of the lotus. Buddha, like the lotus, showed that the spirit of man can ~~rise above the lowliest source and~~ find perfection even among the dregs of the earth.

One who passes a mani wall keeps it on his right, for there is an old Tibetan saying, "Beware of the devils on the left-hand side." The chhorten is a monument of pyramid design, usually whitewashed. They are usually sepulchres where the ashes of a deceased are placed. They are sometimes connected with the mani walls. There is usually one at the entrance of a village. They guard the village, keeping the evil spirits away.

8. Ladakh is one of the few remaining places in the world where a woman has more than one lawful husband. I visited some of these families. One had the name of Dombos. This woman had two husbands. The family owned a few acres of land. The house was a two-story mud and stone affair. It was a gay and happy family. The husbands were brothers. When the oldest brother marries, his wife becomes the wife of all the brothers. The monasteries encourage this institution of polyandry. The Kashmir government opposes it. But it is deep in the traditions of the villages. The effect of polyandry is to keep the population from increasing. Lamas think it serves a good purpose in an area where the food supply is not abundant. They think so because in that way their food supply is protected.

Another polyandry family I visited were the Gyalangs. These people live in a one-room hut. There is much friction between the two brothers. The family is poor as poor can be. A good deal of the barley that the Gyalangs raise goes to make a local beer. Under the influence of this beer, the two husbands raise their voices over the wife.

9-14. Leh, the capital of Ladakh, is a town of 4,000. It lies

11,500 ft. high in a vast sloping basin hemmed by 25,000 ft. peaks. Leh has narrow winding streets made for caravans, not cars. Leh has no cars except a few jeeps of the Indian Army garrison nearby. The main bazaars in Leh are located on a long ~~and~~ L-shaped street. Each shop is flush with the street. At one end of the main street is a ~~Moslem~~ mosque to accommodate the religious needs of a small minority of Moslems in this region. Leh is a peaceful town. Buddha taught the principles of non-violence, and it has had such an effect on the people that even in the hurley-burley of the city of Leh, there have been in recent years no records of any crime of violence and very few thefts.

Leh is on an ancient caravan route that leads to Yarkand in Sinkiang and Lhasa in Tibet. Wool, tea, skins, carpets, borax, salt came down from the north. Cotton goods, opium, pearls, spices, wheat, tobacco came up from the south. These caravans met at Leh and exchanges were made. Great commerce and industry flourished. Leh was indeed the great connecting link between the cold and forbidden land of the north, and the warm and sunny land of the south. Today people still swarm through the bazaar of Leh as they did before. A few of the shops are still open. But the ancient hum of the market is gone. Many of the stores are closed. The heavy wooden doors of the shops have been swung shut and fastened with padlocks. Only a trickle of trade now comes down from the north. The Russians have closed the Sinkiang border. A depression has struck Leh. This ~~was~~ is not a temporary depression. It ~~was~~ is permanent because Russia has ~~turned~~ blocked the trade routes ~~around.~~ ~~For centuries they ran~~ north and south. Now they will run east and west. Russia will use the commerce of China, Tibet, and Sinkiang to lace those three regions tightly into the Soviet empire. This is a part of the Soviet empire building.

High above Leh, and looking down upon it, is the ancient castle of the King of Ladakh. It rises many stories like an awkward skyscraper. Once it was a place of splendor. Now it is empty, filled with cobwebs, bats and the memories of an ancient power. The King of Ladakh, a young man in his 20's, is now an officer in the Indian Army. ~~I met him at Leh.~~ The rule of the kings is ended. The Kashmir Government now makes the laws for this region.

When I was at Leh I saw what probably were the last of the caravans coming down from the north. The first of these were sheep. There is an old Tibetan saying that "sheep are the goods trains." Sheep and goats have been used from time immemorial to bring produce down from the north. The sheep are loaded with pack bags full of salt. They start down from the north in June and travel hundreds of miles, grazing as they go. When they reach their destination, the packs are removed and the salt sold. Then the sheep and the goats are sheared, and their wool is sold. Then the packs are filled with barley or corn, and the herd starts its long way back.

I saw probably the last sheep train that will come down from the north. I saw also probably the last pack train of horses and mules carrying great bales of wool. This wool is the soft wool from the under-belly of the goat. It is the wool that is used to make the famous Kashmir scarves and shawls. It comes from only parts of Sinkiang and Tibet. None of this famous wool is now traveling to Kashmir; it is going east and west into Chinese and Russian markets. As long as China and Russia keep their hold on the northern country, it will never come south again.

Central Asia is mostly in Russia and Tibet. But the northern stretch of India and the outposts along the Sinkiang-Tibetan border are also Central Asia. They are one world. The Communist regimes that lie to the north are a second world. We of the West, propelled by events so fast that we have little time to learn what we did yesterday or what we will do tomorrow, are still a third world. These worlds, ~~when seen through the eyes of an American,~~ seem to be far apart. But it is important that we come to know them if we are to help find solutions to the tremendous revolutions that are sweeping Asia.

Today the Communist regimes have an upper hand in this region. But with small investments in understanding and ~~affection,~~ friendship the influence can shift away from Russia to the ~~democratic influences of the~~ West. ~~The searching for love and affection is endless. It goes on the world around.~~ Communism, with its cruel and exploitive character, does not carry the hopes of the people. ~~What they want is friendship and understanding.~~ ¶ So far we have appeared in Asia largely as a strong military figure. If we want the allegiance of these people of Asia on our side, we must show more than strength. We must show understanding. We must avoid a bloody conflict between East and West. If Asia knew our ~~affection~~ understanding as well as our power, we could be wedded to her in great and noble deeds. ~~The threat of Soviet imperialism would then disappear as the mad dream of another personality as sick as Hitler.~~

Once we were the Champions of Change — of Liberation from usury, tyranny, disease and poverty. ~~In this part of~~ Throughout Asia our Championship is being Challenged. The apetite for Change is there — The Communists are capturing and channelling it, for their own agressive ends. If we fail to meet this Challenge history will take its Revenge.

Dear Ed:

I did not want you to think that I have forgotten the subject of our conversation in your office some months ago. I mentioned to you at the time that I was going to see Earl Newsom and, indeed, did thereafter, getting several suggestions from him. I handed on your thoughts, Earl Newsom's and some other suggestions to the members of the family, including Polly and Sally who are both abroad at this point. I have now heard from them all and they are more or less unanimous in the belief that at this stage caution is of the utmost importance.

I have been in the hospital for about a month for an operation and am home now for several weeks convalescence. When I get out I hope to ask for some more of your time and review the present status of things. You recall that I told you about Chambers articles for the Saturday Evening Post and the book which will be a Book of-the-Month Club selection for May. In this connection I have had discussions, continuing for several months, with counsel for Random House, the publishers of the book. Counsel were unsuccessful in persuading Chambers to omit reference to Larry's name and finally suggested I write a letter myself. I did and enclose herewith a copy of it for your own private information. It did no good - as I expected - for, in fact, Chambers has rejected the suggestion. I don't think the letter did any harm for the record, however.

With warmest regards to you and Janet and looking forward to seeing you again soon.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Whittaker Chambers,
c/o Mr. Horace S. Manges,
Messrs. Weil, Gotshal & Manges,

New York, N.Y.

Dear Sir:

Through the courtesy of Mr. Manges I have been permitted to see those extracts of your forthcoming book which refer to my brother, Laurence Duggan. I have also read those installments of the serial based upon your book which have thus far appeared in the Saturday Evening Post. In the first installment, as I understand you, you have expressed a conviction that America's strength, in part, is derived from its unswerving belief in fair play. I suggest for your consideration that your action in referring to my brother is not consistent with this conviction. I will explain.

At the time of my brother's death in December, 1948, in answer to the direct question of news reporters you stated you had no personal knowledge that he was either a member of the Communist Party or sympathized with its aims. From what I saw of your book that statement is confirmed. But nevertheless you frequently refer to him, and almost without exception the references are based on pure hearsay.

It is this repetition of hearsay and rumor which is, in my judgment, so unfair and therefore wholly inconsistent with the principles which you have expressed in your writing. With the enormous power of the printed word behind it (especially when it is the Saturday Evening Post or a Book-of-the-Month Club publication) an ordinary rumor is soon by repetition an established extraordinary fact, and in a few years is consecrated as history. Americans, all of us, believe a man is innocent until proved guilty, that he should be given the opportunity to defend against a charge. My brother is not here to rise to his feet and say "I deny", and the law affords his memory and family no protection. By repeating these rumors in your book you have, in effect, made yourself prosecutor, judge and jury; you have determined unilaterally that hearsay shall become a fact.

The unfairness becomes particularly apparent, I believe, when the rumors are weighed against, among other things, the following events which took p ace after his death: the clearance given my brother by the Attorney General of the United States who based his statement on information from the F. B. I.; the clearance given by Senator (then Congressman) Nixon on behalf of the House Committee; and the magnificent testimonial given him by the high officials with whom he worked intimately during his dozen years in the State Department, namely, Messrs. Hull, Wells, Berle and Sayre; the expressed faith of the press, radio and other reputable journalists in New York and Washington who knew him, and they usually know a lot; and the payment in full of insurance policies (including double indemnity in case of accidental death) by three separate companies after exhaustive investigation lasting months, - which action in fact said he did not commit suicide and no motive for such a step could be proven.

Nothing new has happened since then except the repetition of rumors, which were known to, and investigated by, the F. B. I. before his name was cleared. Yet now you have chosen to disseminate them widely through media which will add to the damage, soon to become irreparable, to a fine name. When the Berle memorandum was offered at the Hiss trial Judge Goddard directed, so Mr. Murphy told me, that the reference to my brother in that document be blocked out because it was unfair under the circumstances to make it public. The fact that through inadvertence his order was not followed out is beside the point. The Court must then have been motivated by the same belief in the principle of fair play and have been aware of the same circumstances of which I now speak. I say it is not fair, nor in accord with American ideals which all of us are striving to preserve for ourselves and our children to perpetuate hearsay and thereby to injure others without warrant or necessity. For these reasons I believe references to Laurence Duggan should be eliminated from your book.

Very truly yours,

STEPHEN P. DUGGAN, JR.

Dear Ed:

Apropos of our telephone talk several weeks ago, I enclose herewith copies of several clippings. The Sokolsky one has been the most vicious so far. Its being syndicated and republished in many papers adds to its unfortunate character.

The book review by Gannett, although having a favorable last paragraph, astonishes me in that they took the book as seriously as they did.

I do not feel that the moment has yet arrived to do anything but I thought you would be interested in seeing these clippings in the event you had missed them.

With warmest regards,

Sincerely yours,

Steve Duggan

BOOKS AND THINGS

By LEWIS GANNETT

THIS DECEPTION. By Hede Massing. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. 335 pages. $3.50.

THE Austrian-born woman who married Gerhart Eisler, young Communist leader, in her twenties; who was trained in Soviet espionage by Ignace Reiss, a Communist bigshot who was bumped off in Switzerland in 1937, six weeks after he denounced Stalin; who in the middle 1930s worked in Washington, making contacts with Noel Field and Alger Hiss, who extricated herself from the Communist "apparatus" after 1938 and in 1947 told her story to the F. B. I., reveals her life story in "This Deception." It is, on the whole, the most readable as well as psychologically the most convincing story yet told by an ex-Communist.

Hede Massing

Memories of an Ex-Communist

The conviction stems in part from the fact that it isn't altogether a forgetful penitent's story. Mrs. Massing remembers her first husband, Eisler—who, after his escape from America, bobbed up again in Eastern Germany—with affection. She recalls gratefully the "sense of great security and well-being" which her fellow-traveling second husband gave her. She writes fondly of the "wonderful big smile" of Ludwig, her teacher and boss. She recalls the "humanitarian" glow as well as the sense of high adventure in her early years in the Communist movement. And she is equally happy in remembering how she poured out her heart, telling of her crumbled illusions to her friends in the F. B. I. That was "like a psychoanalysis."

The Psychology of the Break

What is hardest for her to understand today is how she and her third husband, doubting greatly, remained so long in the Soviet web. That is always the crux of the story. But even on that Mrs. Massing is convincing. She says:

> The breaking away from the movement, whatever function one might hold within it, does not come in a flash. It is a slow, painful process. It is not a decision one makes, but a decision that grows. It grows slowly in the beginning. It is nourished by disillusionment. And then finally come the days when one is sick enough. And still it is like renouncing your religion, your family, your life's work, the taking leave of your friends—all at once. . . . You go into loneliness, you hide. Slowly you recover, as from an illness.

That is keen self-analysis. Perhaps the gradualness of her own recovery explains why Mrs. Massing's narrative has so little of the common ex-Communist's neuroses. She always hated and still hates the mechanically conditioned wooden-headed Russian bureaucrats, but she has not forgotten the romantic fire of her youth in the movement. She understands how decent people have been caught in the network and poisoned, and she obviously hopes that more of her erstwhile comrades in America will yet see the light.

High Drama

High drama packs her pages. One dramatic moment, which perhaps impresses her more today than it did then, was her first attendance at one of President Roosevelt's press conferences in Washington—her "first lesson in democracy." There are lively sketches of lost comrades, including the amazing Dr. Richard Sorge, who played the role of a Nazi in the Far East, and was discovered and shot by the Japanese. "I believe him to be the only Russian agent who can be considered heroic by Americans," Mrs. Massing says. "Ludwig"—Ignace Reiss—the Old Bolshevik, disillusioned by the Russian purges, is another sympathetic portrait. There are also the faceless cogs in the machine, usually known to Mrs. Massing only by some assumed first name, Walter or Bill or Paul, and Helen, who lured Hede Massing back to Moscow, possibly for intended death.

It must have taken courage, and perhaps more lingering faith in Communism than Mrs. Massing now remembers, to return to Moscow in 1938 to ask permission to withdraw from the apparatus. The story of that visit is a dizzy, bitter picture of the fantastic life of the foreign comrade in the Communist capital. Probably it was a chance contact with the bewildered Noel Field that insured the Massings' escape. Noel Field she pictures as a neurotic and uncertain idealist; he is now somewhere behind the Iron Curtain, whether as a prisoner or a confessing convert only the Kremlin knows for sure.

A Dubious Chapter

Most of Mrs. Massing's story she told with the collaboration of Eugene Lyons in "The New York Daily Mirror" a year ago. The outlines of the story are unchanged, but new details are added, notably in the case of the late Laurence Duggan. The house which originally contracted to publish Mrs. Massing's book asked her to delete the dubious Duggan chapter. She indignantly refused, and took her book to her present publishers. In the disputed chapter Mrs. Massing implies that Mr. Duggan joined her group, although on another page she explicitly doubts that he did. Mrs. Massing makes no mention of the Attorney General's statement, made after Duggan's death, that Duggan was "a loyal employee of the United States government," who had told the F. B. I. of the Communist approach to him and of his rebuff of it.

THESE DAYS

—By George E. Sokolsky

THE problem of the former Communist intrigues all sorts of people. Some, like Bernard Devoto, wonder why he should believe them. They were wrong once, may they not be wrong again? They changed once, might they not change again?

My own experience since 1917 shows that it is next to impossible to get at the heart of Communist organization and activities without the assistance of renegade Communists.

Even students who have devoted themselves to the problem, no matter how assiduously, for decades, find that there are missing links, unexplained details, curious personal relationships, without which even academic analysis becomes hopeless.

So we come to the question of Hede Massing's forthcoming book, entitled "This Deception." Hede Massing is the former wife of Gerhart Eisler, who represented the Third International in the United States and was the most powerful Communist in this country for a period.

Eisler escaped from the United States on the polish ship Batory under scandalous circumstances.

MRS. MASSING wrote a book on her experiences, which Farrar, Straus & Young accepted. The type was set. The book was ready for publication. Then Mrs. Massing was told that this firm desired that a chapter relating to Laurence Duggan be omitted. Otherwise, the book would not be published.

It would seem that Roger W. Straus Jr. of the publishing firm became "morally" concerned with the elimination of the Duggan chapter out of regard for Duggan's widow and children. It is a point of fine sentimentality.

Laurence Duggan was a member of the state department group that came out of Harvard and the Institute of Pacific Relations which some have held responsible for our errors in Asia. He was also a very close friend and protege of Sumner Welles. And he either committed suicide or was pushed out of a window.

ACCORDING TO Mrs. Hede Massing, Laurence Duggan offered his services to her and she handed him over to another group. This is either an important historic fact or a libel. In fact, Farrar, Straus and Young have not contended that they want the chapter suppressed because of libel but rather because of the moral issue of protecting Duggan's widow and orphans.

Morris Ernst has written a foreword to this book in which he said:

"It explicitly touches on a very sensitive spot in the culture of our nation. Why do people join the Communist party? I know of no one who has told before so clearly the reasons why people do things like this, how they fool people, use them innocently. I wish that all our legislators, officials and public leaders would read this volume."

So Mrs. Massing refused to suppress the chapter and the book will be published on March 14 by Duell, Sloan and Pearce, to whom the rights and plates were transferred.

I CAN undestand 'Straus' sentiments. The little boys who played with treason, with betrayal of their own country, with espionage have brought disgrace upon their families, their parents, their wives, their children.

I knew Laurence Duggan's father, who had been professor at the College of the City of New York and director of the Institute of International Education, a Carnegie benefaction.

He was a man of extraordinary capacity for friendship who devoted his life to the international exchange of students. He was an upright American.

It must have been a frightful shock to him when Laurence either committed suicide or was killed. It is tough for any father to lose a son whose career seemed to be so remarkable. Yet, the father could not have suffered the despair of suspicion.

I SHOULD imagine that I am as sentimental about this as Roger Straus, but a fact is a fact, and the facts of the Communist conspiracy must be told.

Undoubtedly, some influence was brought to bear on Mr. Straus, but the misery of it is that it is as important to get at the facts of this conspiracy as it is to fight in Korea. Maybe it is even more important.

Dear Sir:-

I should be very grateful if you would write a memorial of our fellow member whose name is on the attached card. I enclose some material which may help you. Will you please mail the enclosures back to me again when they have served your purpose.

The memorial ought to run somewhere between 350 and 1,000 words, and it may well contain reminiscences, or descriptions of his manner or conversation or friends -- or, indeed, anything you are moved to set down. I am trying to keep as nearly abreast of the Club's annuals as possible, and so I shall appreciate it if the memorial is sent in as soon as is convenient to you.

If you find this assignment is quite beyond you (I hope not) won't you please suggest the member of the Century who ought to be asked to do it?

With many thanks, I am,

Faithfully yours,

George W. Martin,
Historian.

STEPHEN P. DUGGAN, EDUCATOR, 79, DIES

Founded International Institute in 1919 to Promote Peace—Taught at City College

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

STAMFORD, Conn., Aug. 18—Dr. Stephen P. Duggan, founder and director emeritus of the Institute of International Education, died this morning in Stamford Hospital after a long illness. His age was 79.

Famed as a scholar in the field of international relations, Dr. Duggan founded the institute in 1919. He retired in 1946 and was succeeded by his son, Laurence, who fell to his death from a window of his sixteenth-floor offices at the institute's New York headquarters, 2 West Forty-fifth Street, on Dec. 20, 1948. The son had served in the State Department from 1930 to 1944.

Dr. Duggan made his home here in Old Long Ridge Road. He leaves his wife, Mrs. Sarah Elsesser Duggan; two daughters, Mary Duggan and Mrs. Alfred Weld, and a son, Stephen Duggan Jr.

A private funeral service will be held here on Monday in St. Francis Protestant Episcopal Church.

Credo Behind His Work

"Education is the only certain road to the attainment of world peace." Thus Dr. Stephen Pierce Duggan, in one of his innumerable commencement addresses, expressed the credo behind his educational work for international amity and good-will.

His main contribution to this ideal was as organizer and director of the Institute of International Education, which specializes in the promotion of exchange scholarships between the United States and other nations. He founded the institute at the request of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, which provided funds for the project. Later the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial also contributed financial support.

So manifold were his activities in this cause that he was once characterized as the one-man "antidote to war." In 1928, he gave up a distinguished career as Professor of Political Science at City College to devote himself exclusively to the field of cultivating international good-will.

An authority on Latin America, his books on the subject did much to advance the Good Neighbor policy. He also headed committees to aid exiled scholars of Germany, Spain and Russia.

Born in New York on Dec. 20, 1870, he was the son of Hugh and Mary D. Hayden Duggan. His father had come to this country when a young man in 1837 from Londonderry, Northern Ireland. His mother was born in England.

Studied at City and Columbia

Dr. Duggan was graduated at the age of 15 from Public School 40 and received a Bachelor of Arts degree from City College in 1890. Soon after he became a teacher in public schools.

In 1896, when he received a Master of Science degree from City College, he was appointed a tutor in philosophy there, and the next year he became an instructor. Continuing his studies at Columbia University, he received a Master of Arts degree in 1898 and a Doctorate of Philosophy in 1902.

His rise on the City College faculty was rapid. In 1901 he was made Associate Professor of Philosophy and in 1906 he was appointed head of the education department. The next year he organized the teachers extension and evening courses and became head of the department. He was appointed Professor of Government in 1910.

Dr. Duggan conceived his idea for promoting international peace during World War I. He was one of a group of Americans who sent a report to the League of Nations in 1924 on the limitation of armaments.

The next year he served on the Philippines Educational Survey Commission and on the way home visited China, Siberia, Russia, Central and Western Europe. He was often consulted by the State Department.

In the Thirties he was active in promoting cultural exchanges with countries of South America and in 1933 he was appointed by President Roosevelt to serve on the Brazilian-American Conciliation Commission.

Received Two Awards in '34

Dr. Duggan was president of the Associate Alumni of City College and the local Phi Beta Kappa chapter. In 1934 he received the Townsend Harris Medal for Achievement and the same year the Alumni Association of Columbia University gave him an award for his work in education.

In 1948, the Associate Alumni of City College created the John H. Finley medal for distinguished service to New York, in memory of Dr. Finley, who was president of City College from 1903 to 1913 and later editor of THE NEW YORK TIMES. He died in 1940. The first award that year was bestowed by Dr. Duggan upon the Rockefeller family.

Dr. Duggan was the recipient of many honorary degrees and several awards from foreign countries. He was an officiating member of many scholarly, civic and social organizations. His clubs were the Cosmos in Washington and the Century in New York.

Among his books were "The Eastern Question, a Study in Diplomacy," "The League of Nations, the Principle and the Practice," "The Two Americas," "A Student's History of Education" and "A Professor at Large."

EDWARD MAGNUS

WATCH HILL, R. I., Aug. 18 (AP)—Edward Magnus, a member of the board of directors of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Company, St. Louis, died today in his summer home at the age of 75.

Mr. Magnus, who was spending the summer here with his wife, the former Nellie Orthwein, was active in the management of the brewing company until his retirement in 1945.

DAVID LVOVITCH, O. R. T. LEADER, 68

Chief of Executive Committee of World Union Dies in Paris—Trained 35,000 D. P.'s

Dr. David Lvovitch, chairman of the executive committee of the World O. R. T. Union, died on Thursday in Paris of a stroke. He was 68 years old.

A native of Russia, Dr. Lvovitch became a citizen of this country in 1939. Although he maintained a residence here in the Peter Stuyvesant Hotel, he had spent much of his time in Europe since the end of World War II.

His duties with the World Union of the O. R. T., or Organization for Rehabilitation through Training, had recently kept him in Paris.

A leader for three decades in the O. R. T. movement, Dr. Lvovitch founded the agency's unit in Poland in 1920. The next year, when the World Union was founded in Berlin, he became vice president.

In addition to his long service with European branches of the agency, which sponsors vocational training programs for Jewish workers, he also had assisted the American O. R. T. Federation with its programs.

At the end of the recent war, Dr. Lvovitch organized O. R. T. programs in displaced persons camps in Germany — programs which eventually trained more than 35,000 workers for skilled jobs.

Dr. Lvovitch studied engineering, law and economics in Munich and at the University of St. Petersburg.

Surviving are his widow, Cornelia, and a son, Harry, both residing in Paris.

PAUL NEVIN

Paul Nevin, broker associated for the last twenty years with Sparkman & Stephens, Inc., yacht designers and brokers, died Thursday night in Doctors Hospital after an illness of several months. His age was 61. His home was on Hollow Tree Ridge Road, Darien, Conn.

Born in Quincy, Mass., the son of Ethelbert Nevin, the composer, Mr. Nevin attended Lawrenceville School before graduating from Princeton University in the Class of '12. He was a member of the Cottage Club at Princeton.

After serving in the Navy Transport Division in World War I, Mr. Nevin spent four years as an oil driller in Oklahoma. He was an instructor in navigation at the Merchant Marine Academy, Kings Point, L. I., during World War II.

He was a member of the Cruising Club of America and the New York Yacht Club.

Surviving are his widow, the former Jennie Fasset; two daughters, Mrs. Anne Chamberlin and Miss Jane Nevin; and two sons, Crocker and Ethelbert 2nd.

JOSEPH J. M'GRAW

Joseph J. McGraw of 31 Bank Street, state supervisor of on-the-job training for the New York State Division of Veterans Affairs, 270 Broadway, died yesterday of a heart attack in St. Louis. His age was 61. He was on the way to Colorado for a vacation.

Born in this city, Mr. McGraw attended New York University. After service in the first World War he became secretary-treasurer of the General Outdoor Advertising Company. Later he was with the New York City Department of Welfare. He joined the State Division of Veterans Affairs in 1945 as field supervisor for the training program in metropolitan New York.

Two daughters, the Misses Julia and Mary Ursula McGraw, survive.

LOUIS PAPP

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

UNION, N. J., Aug. 18—Louis Papp of 1387 Isabella Avenue, a custom tailor and designer for the firm of Morland B. Soria Inc., in near-by Newark, for twenty-eight years, died last night at his home after an illness of several months. His age was 63. Born in Hungary, he had resided here since 1904.

He leaves his wife, Katie Papp; a daughter, Mrs. Carl Herold of Union; a son, Albert L. Papp of Maplewood, and three grandchildren.

CLIFFORD W. MUELLER

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 18—Clifford W. Mueller, since 1936 president of W. H. Anderson Company, publisher of law books, died yesterday at the age of 56. He also was a director of The Ohio Law Reporter. Mr. Mueller was a charter member of the National Association of Small Business Men, and a director of St. Peter and St. Paul United Church of Christ.

FREDERIC C. EMANS

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Aug. 18—Frederic C. Emans of Hyde Park, who formerly conducted grocery stores in Peekskill, Pine Plains and Wiccopee, died yesterday in Vassar Hospital. His age was 71. He leaves a daughter, Mrs. David Whiten, and a sister.

Dr. Stephen Duggan Dies at 79; International Education Leader

Founder of World Institute of Education Was With City College 35 Years

Special to the Herald Tribune

STAMFORD, Conn., Aug. 18.—Dr. Stephen Duggan, seventy-nine, founder and director emeritus of the Institute of International Education, died this morning at Stamford Hospital. His home was on Old Long Ridge Road.

At the reques tof the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Dr. Duggan organized the institute in 1919 and served as its director until his retirement in 1946. He was succeeded by his son, Laurence, who fell to his death from the institute offices at 2 West Forty-fifty Street, on Dec. 20, 1948.

Dr. Duggan was born in New York City. He was graduated from City College in 1890, and joined the college staff as a fellow three years later. He was appointed an instructor in political science in 1898, when he received his Master of Science degree from the college. Two years later he received his Doctor of Philosophy degree from Columbia University.

With College 35 Years

He was associated with City College for thirty-five years, rising to the rank of professor of political science and dean of the School of Education. He organized and directed the extension courses at the college and was the first director of the evening session there. He left the college in 1928.

Dr. Duggan once described the Institute of International Education as having "one great objective: to try and develop an understanding of other peoples and their problems by Americans and an understanding of our civilization by other peoples."

To this end, Dr. Duggan himself lectured on international relations at Columbia University and at the universities of Berlin, Vienna, Prague, Budapest and the Royal Institute of International Affairs at London.

During the latter half of 1931, he visited several South American countries to strengthen educational and cultural co-operation between these countries and the United States and was instrumental thereafter in bringing more than 1,000 Latin-American students to the United States on fellowships. He worked closely with the State Department on such matters, as a member of the [illegible]sory board of its division of [illegible] relations.

Other Posts He held

He had served as secretary of the American University Union in Europe since 1926. He was a trustee of the American College for Girls in Istanbul, the Associated Boards for Christian Colleges in China, the American College at Athens and the World Peace Foundation, and a director of the Council on Foreign Relations, the Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation and the Netherlands-American Foundation.

Dr. Duggan served four terms as president of the City College Alumni Association, the last ending in 1948. He was a member of Phi Beta Kappa and Kappa Delta Phi. He was a Commander of the Order of the Crown of Italy; an Officer of the Legion of Honor, of France; an officer of the Order of the White Lion, of Czechoslovakia; an officer of Hungary's Order of Merit; commander of the Roumanian Order of the Star, and a member of Chile's Order of Merit. He was a member of the Century Club in New York City and the Cosmos Club in Washington.

Dr. Duggan was the author of several books, including "The Eastern Question—A Study in Diplomacy," "A History of Education," "The Two Americas—An Interpretation," and, most recently, "A Professor at Large," published in 1943.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The presentation of the Laurence Duggan Fund will be made on Friday, April 8, at 2 P.M. in the offices of the Institute of International Education, 2 West 45 Street, New York. In a brief ceremony, Mr. Archibald MacLeish will present the Fund to Dr. George N. Shuster, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Institute. An invitation to attend the presentation has been extended to members of the Duggan family and to the Institute trustees. All the members of the staff will be present.

We should be very happy to have with us at that time members of the group sponsoring the Laurence Duggan Fund who would find it possible to attend. Enclosed is a return postal card on which you may indicate whether you will be in the city on that day and can join us.

The Fund totals over $21,000. from 411 contributors. It is expected that a few more gifts will be received. If you have suggestions of others who may wish to contribute before the presentation date, please let me know.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed.

I have cast the die.

Come Monday, I go to work for Max Ascoli's new magazine The Reporter

Maybe it is a gamble but it is well worth taking financially and will give me a chance to make a current reputation if any —

One of the insurance companies has acted in our favor. I should hear word from the others in the near future. Then I would like to see you — if it still seems right to you.

Sincerely

Copy for Mr. Murrow

Confidential

February 17, 1949

President George Shuster
Hunter College
695 Park Avenue
New York 21, N.Y.

Dear Dr. Shuster:

When I returned from a two-day absence in New York this morning, I found a copy of Dr. Fisher's letter to Mr. Packard. I called Mr. Packard on the phone at once and learned that he had forwarded Dr. Fisher's letter to you. As you knew nothing of the previous correspondence, I called up Miss Dowd, who is good enough to look after my affairs at the Institute because there are many still to look after. I asked her to send you a copy of my answer to Dr. Fisher's first letter to me. I am now sending a few comments on Dr. Fisher's letter to Mr. Packard.

One can't read that letter without wondering what the other forty-five members of the staff had been doing during my administration because Dr. Fisher portrays himself as having done practically everything. He says that he had to take home work at night. Who didn't? Not only did I do so but all the heads of divisions frequently complained that they had to do so in order to complete their work. As Dr. Fisher himself says, we were always understaffed due to my policy - perhaps a mistaken one - of not refusing any reasonable request for advice and assistance. We were all overworked.

Dr. Fisher states that when he was on vacation there was sent from the office much material for him to look after. During my vacation I went two days every week to the Institute and had all the mail sent here to Stamford on the other days to indicate what should be done with each letter or pamphlet. Dr. Fisher did not indicate that when he was asked to give a course on International Relations at Chautauqua but could not accept because it had to be a six weeks' course to secure credit, I extended his vacation from a month to six weeks in order to enable him to do so. Laurence inquired of me why Dr. Fisher was favored on the length of vacation, but agreed to allow it to continue.

Dr. Fisher states his being "eased out" of the Institute caused him financial loss. I do not know what he was paid at Chautauqua but certainly not less than $500, and since he did the work for eight or ten years, my extending his vacation did result in financial gain.

Moreover his course at Chautauqua resulted in his being invited to give lectures at colleges for fees. At each request I consented with the understanding that he would visit our foreign students not only in that institution but in neighboring ones and report to me. His fees did bring him financial gain. I approved of the practice because having lectured myself in the earlier days of the Institute I discovered how valuable it was to discuss Institute problems with faculty members around the table. Moreover Dr. Fisher was a good lecturer and did represent the Institute.

When I retired from the directorship I told my successor I would never offer advice but would be glad to give it if I were asked. Laurence asked my advice on the "Fisher" problem as he phrased it at the end of his first year of administration. He said that he had never received a creative suggestion from Dr. Fisher during the whole year and that Dr. Fisher had a closed mind to new methods of Institute expansion and administration. He said that Dr. Fisher was really a $5,000 man holding a $10,000 job and he wanted the $10,000 for someone with more vision and ability. He said too much more to put down on paper. I shall be glad to give it if you care to have me do so.

I regret that Mr. Packard sent you Dr. Fisher's letter, not because of any lack of desire to have you read it but because Dr. Fisher himself stated it was not for publication and quoted Mr. Murrow to the effect that a continuance of the correspondence would avail nothing, but also because I can foresee only a nasty mess arising from the spread of the correspondence. Mr. Packard was good enough to try to allay my fears by saying the matter would be considered in a dignified manner and without hurt to Laurence's memory. But Laurence is no longer here to explain his attitude toward Dr. Fisher. I would want to tell my side of the pre-Laurence period. The splendid group of women who had so often complained to me that they could not get advice and assistance from Dr. Fisher when they asked for it and who begged that Dr. Fisher should not succeed me ought also to be heard in any discussion.

Dr. Fisher says in his letter to me and in the one to Mr. Packard that despite the injustice done him he is too much of a Christian to allow himself to become embittered. His Christianity did not prevent him spreading the story of Laurence's "iniquity" before he left New York and, I have been confidentially informed and have reason to believe, since he left New York. Whether intentially or not, he began this correspondence only after Laurence was dead and unable to give his side of any complaint.

I wonder whether my poor son will ever be allowed to rest in peace.

Sincerely yours,

Stephen Duggan

P.S. Had I not been suffering from intestinal flu, I would have gone to see you today. I must go to the city next Wednesday. I hope I may see you then either at Hunter or at the Century Club.

P.P.S. I am sending copies of this letter to Mr. Packard and Mr. Murrow.

CONFIDENTIAL - For Mr. Edward R. Murrow

February 3, 1949

Dear Dr. Fisher:

I am in receipt of your letter of January 27, 1949 "for information and not for publication." I hope that didn't prohibit me from showing it to Arthur Packard and Edward Murrow. I have done so partly to confirm my own recollection and partly to let them answer, if they cared to do so.

The letter does not contain all the facts of the matter, and some that it does contain are inaccurate. I am correcting a few and giving others but by no means all so that there may not arise an unpleasant controversy.

The letter states "Dr. Stephen Duggan had hoped and expected that I would succeed him as Director." Not "expected", for no sooner was it generally known that I was about to retire than protests against such action from some trustees, some of the staff and some less intimately associated with the Institute were made to me. These protests were based partly upon personality, partly upon lack of vision as to the future of the Institute in the new world resulting from the war, and partly upon ineffectiveness in dealing with the staff. I did not speak of them to you because the Committee appointed by the Board of Trustees to secure my successor, though it knew of these protests, thought age was a sufficient enough basis for your non-selection. You were then sixty-one or sixty-two.

The third paragraph should emphasize more fully that I did not suggest to you or anyone else that any action be initiated to present the name of Laurence Duggan to the Committee. Your correspondence with Mr. Welles was your own initiative. It ought also to be more fully emphasized that Laurence did not want his father or anyone else at the Institute to present his name to the Committee. Dr. Leland told me after the selection had been made that he, Murrow and Packard, all of whom knew Laurence personally, had from the beginning believed him the best man for the position, though they carefully considered the qualifications of other men. Miss Gildersleeve, who did not know Laurence personally, gladly made it unanimous.

I did recommend that you be made Associate Director, but I do not believe that Laurence did. As you state further down in the paragraph, the Committee of Reorganization approved a recommendation of the new Director for two top executives under the Director. I knew after that was adopted that Laurence did not contemplate recommending you for one of them.

I know nothing about the luncheon meeting you held with Mr. Marrow and Mr. Packard. When my successor was elected I assured him that I would not make suggestions concerning the Institute unless I was asked. And I have maintained that attitude since.

The third page of your letter leaves out much background of which you were ignorant. Some trustees, apparently upon reflection, thought the action of the Board on June 25, 1947, requesting your severance with the Institute, too severe and suggested a modification. Others thought the action should be maintained. In view of the division in the Board, it was I who introduced the resolution providing that Dr. Fisher give two-thirds of his time to the work of the Institute under a title to be determined by the Director and that the Institute, in Dr. Fisher's own language, "cover my total remaining contribution to the Teachers Insurance and Annuity Association until September 1950 for which action I expressed appreciation." My action was a compromise inspired by a desire to prevent unpleasant controversy and a possible more unhappy decision. Itwas able to introduce the resolution because it was only later that actions upon an age limit for trustees and for staff, which had been under discussion was voted. This action retired Dr. Leland, Professor Chamberlain, Miss Gildersleeve and myself from the Board of Trustees.

On page 4 of your letter you mention that you wrote to a score of college administrators informing them of your desire to withdraw from the Institute and of your availability for another position. You fail to mention that I also sent several similar letters,which I showed you before sending, and gave you the answers to them. I mention that for only one reason: You say "It appeared to me that Mr. Duggan was seeking to force me out of the field of international education." Nothing could be more untrue or unfair. I showed Laurence the letters I had written to college administrators, all of which praised your knowledge in the field of international education, and he expressed not only his approval but his hope that they would bring favorable results. He, himself, wrote similar letters from two of which I quote as follows: "Dr. Fisher could make his maximum contribution in a job where his knowledge of European and Near Eastern education could be drawn upon. He has a host of friends in these areas. He knows conditions there from first-hand experience. He speaks French fluently." "He (Dr. Fisher) would also be interested in a position as dean of a college. In this regard it occurred to me that you might know of opportunities, actual or imminent. If so, I would be immensely grateful to you for sending them along. Dr. Fisher did a Herculean work at the Institute . .. and I want to help him all I can."

Moreover you will remember that after you joined the Institute you were offered the position at Chautauqua Summer School to give the six weeks' course in International Relations. But each member of the staff at that time was given only one month vacation in the summer. I went beyond my authority in giving you the necessary six weeks, which was done each year. When Laurence succeeded me and the question of summer vacations arose he asked about the extension of your vacation and when I explained the reason he stated that the extension should be continued.

I regret to have received your letter a little more than a month after Laurence's tragic death. You know, no doubt, of the general public condemnation of the statement issued by the Un-American Activities Committee immediately after Laurence's death, insinuating disloyalty by Laurence while in the State Department. The editorials of our finest newspapers and the broadcasts of our best known commentators were one in condemning such an action about a man who could no longer defend his integrity. I do not believe that you deliberately wrote this statement because Laurence was no longer here; otherwise you would not label it "not for publication." I am certain that its publication would have aroused the same defense among all those in and closely associated with the Institute.

Sincerely yours,

Stephen Duggan
Director Emeritus

Mr. M

Mr. Packard dictated the following to me over the phone. He would like to send it out today and would like your reaction before doing so:

"Dear Dr. Fisher:

"Thank you for your letter of January 27th and for the statement that came with it setting forth your views and interpretations concerning your withdrawal from the service of the Institute of International Education.

"Since your memorandum interprets and comments upon the Board of the Institute; since it reflects an estimate of Laurence Duggan which runs counter to the expressions of confidence which the Executive Committee of the Board publicly expressed in him at the time of his death; since Laurence Duggan with whom your statement is largely concerned is, unfortunately, not here to comment on your statement, and since in the light of the foregoing, your statement involves the Institute as an organization whose welfare we both have at heart, I do not feel that I could make a personal comment on your statement without involving the Institute and the trustees. I plan therefore to refer the matter to the forthcoming meeting of the Board later this month.

"With all good wishes.

"Sincerely yours,"

Dear Mr. Lindley:

I have just read your article and the news item in your Newsweek Magazine on the death of Mr. Lawrence Duggan. Having had an experience in raising a window in a New York skyscraper myself, and nearly falling out, I think it plain that his death was accidental. From the fact that he were one overshoe, I would suppose that he was preparing to go home, and had put on one overshoe, got dizzy or hot from bending down, and wanted some air. Had he raised the window at that time, he might have had my experience-- my window shot up unexpectedly fast, and I found myself with my arms raised, and my body surging forward out of the window, while the view downward frightened me almost enough to make me let go and fall. The impulse I had was to let go the window handles and try to catch something back in the room. But fortunately I did not do so, and regained my balance almost at once. I have always thought since then that all New York windows should be barred, to prevent such accidents. That was some years ago, and still frightens me when I think of it. Today, with my back weak, I can well imagine that a similar situation would be the end of me, and your magazine stated that Mr. Duggan had some spinal pain. This alone could have given him enough of a spasmodic twist to send him through the open window. Furthermore his rubber-shod foot could have slipped and thrown him, especially if any snow fell inwards as he raised the window, or if the floor was slippery.

If it had not been for the spectacular jump by Mrs. Kasenkina and the similar fate of Mr. Masaryk, I do not believe anyone would have suggested Mr. Duggan would take his own life, even if he were not, as his friends have emphasized, a man of fine character.

I think perhaps your article may be of great comfort to his bereaved family, as indicating that Mr. Duggan's death and its dramatising of a reprehensible state of affairs in the Congressional technique may lead to a reform there that will save some other patriotic soul from the agony of unfounded slander. Perhaps if members of the investigating committee had less other work to do they would have time to be briefed on judicial methods. Perhaps the work of such a committee should not be superimposed on a regular Congressman's duties, but outside experts should be employed.

Yours very truly,

/s/ Marie Jackson

Dear Ed, You knew Laurence so well that there is no need to speak of his splendid personality, his kindliness, his consideration for others and his devotion to his family and his work. Even you do not know of the nights and Sundays he spent at the State Department at the request of Mr Hull in order to catch up with the accumulation of business caused by the war. No one could have shown more devotion to his work for the sake of his country and its government. That was only in line with the high principles which governed his life.

I am writing this note to express my indebtedness to you for the manly and courageous manner in which you at once sprang to the defense of his honor when he could no longer defend himself. And also for your indignant condemnation for the mean-spirited little men who undertook to destroy his incorruptible character.

I am personally of the belief that the interests of justice and the national welfare would best be served by the abolition of the Un American Activities Committee and placing reliance upon the F.B.I whose objective is to seek the facts and not sensational headlines. I am sure that Lawrence's death will result in improvement in the way of holding meetings of Congressional committees but the loss of such a son is too great a price to pay.

Gratefully Yours,

Stephen Duggan

COPY FOR MR. MURROW

December 31, 1948.

Dear Dr. Duggan:

I appreciate very much the feeling which prompts you to let me see the draft of your letter to the Times. I feel just as you do about it, and, God knows, there is every justification for making your point. As a matter of factual comment, I should suggest deleting the phrase relating to Levine, "another self-confessed former Russian Communist", because I have no documentary evidence to substantiate it. Your remarks about Mundt are more than justified; in fact, the editorial pages of the Times, the Tribune, and many journalists and commentators have used even severer language.

Because of my own feelings, I find great difficulty in being objective. With a distinct effort, therefore, I bring up for your consideration one possibility which you may wish to consider, if it has not already occurred to you.

Public and press have already passed their verdict on Mr. Mundt's action,--a complete condemnation from which he will probably never recover. They have wholly cleared Larry's memory by a vindication almost unparallelled in its swiftness. So far as Larry's memory is concerned, indeed the present record can hardly be improved, save as it will be inevitably by the many tributes which are swelling the account. Your letter might have the effect of leading Mundt by way of answer to try to reopen the question, spreading more false innuendoes which again have to be crushed. Mundt can hardly make his present position any worse. He may think he can make it better. Levine is in somewhat the same position. If you have not already done so, you may want to give thought to whether a possible renewal of Mundt's attack might not affect in part the results of your letter. When I was in the Government we used to be told never to give an enemy a second chance at a headline after he was thoroughly smashed.

But this is a decision which only you can make--and I merely raise it for your consideration because of the clear justification for your feeling, for the impulse which leads you to write the letter, and for resenting the public wrong which was attempted--even though it failed. It is difficult to write even so much since my own emotion is exactly the same as yours.

May I also express the hope that next year may bring you consolation and peace, and surcease of sorrows.

Faithfully,

A. A. Berle, Jr.

Since writing to ask you for your supplementary comment, I seem to have misplaced your original broadcast in regard to Larry Duggan, and therefore I have to bother you to send me another copy.

After discussion with Dr. Duggan I am getting together a certain amount of material in which of course your eloquent words would figure prominently, with a view to printing at the Overbrook Press a suitable memorial volume for Larry's family and particularly for his children.

You might send the scripts, and any other items which you come across and which may have escaped me and seem to you to merit inclusion, to the address above.

Consultation

December 24, 1948

I propose urgently and with complete convinction of its success a documentary titled "The Duggan Story". This show, probably thirty minutes in length, will be made up exclusively of material that is on the record, using primarily the voices of those who have participated in this fantastic story. Both Fred Friendly and myself are prepared, together with Lee Bland, our Special Events Director, to write and produce such a program without cost to CBS and, if you think advisable, without billing of any kind.

I am entirely persuaded that such a program, wholly factual, without editorial content, would have a great impact on the public mind and would in the military vernacular, "reflect great credit upon CBS".

If you look with favor upon this project, I can anticipate only one major difficulty and that is that the sound library, the recordings of public utterances by the participants in this story, is wholly inadequate. (This inadequacy is something I have discussed previously with both you and Dr. Stanton.) However, in spite of this, I am certain that we can do a program that will be in the best traditions of this network.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Mr. Duggan has informed Mr. Pierson and me of your telephone conversation concerning Mr. Peter Zenkl, whom you suggest for our lecturing program.

Perhaps you will recall that last March the Board of Trustees adopted a new policy for this Division, one part of which limits the number of lecturers whom we can sponsor in any one year. We have already committed ourselves to the full quota of six for 1948-49 and, as you can well imagine, our staff is more than busy at present arranging their engagements.

While it will not be possible to organize a series of lectures for Mr. Zenkl, we nevertheless shall keep him in mind for any requests for speakers on his topics. Perhaps we can put him in touch with a few additional engagements.

It is good to hear the familiar voice on the radio once again!

HARVARD'S TERCENTENARY AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE

DURING the past month the alumni and students of Harvard University engaged in a great celebration to commemorate the three hundredth anniversary of its founding. Thousands of non-Harvard men and women throughout the country viewed the celebration with sympathy and rejoicing, for the tercentenary was a national event of the greatest importance in the history of higher education in the United States. During those three centuries Harvard gave the nation many of its leaders in politics, literature, science and philosophy. It provided guidance and assistance to many of the younger colleges throughout the country by its example and by means of its graduates who taught and administered in them. The record of its contribution in every field of research is most impressive. Every intelligent non-Harvard citizen will want to express to the oldest college in North America congratulations for its past achievements, and sincere and confident wishes for its future.

Were we to stop here we should lose the chief significance of the Harvard celebration. Harvard stands for freedom: freedom to undertake with energy and courage the research that will advance the boundaries of knowledge; freedom to engage in untrammeled and enlightening discussion that alone will prepare men as educated citizens for service to a democratic state; freedom to advocate an unpopular cause that ought to be sustained. Freedom at Harvard has not gone without attack. As early as the days of the Salem Witchcraft, Judge Saltonstall, a Harvard graduate, preferred to resign from the bench rather than sentence people to death upon fanatical charges and the President of Harvard was one of the chief agencies in recalling people to a rational attitude towards the absurd mania. From those days to but yesterday attacks upon freedom at Harvard have not been wanting. It is not so many years back that reactionary alumni petitioned the Harvard authorities to dismiss a professor accused of teaching radical doctrines. But the administration at Harvard stood adamant against such suggestion. The Harvard faculty has always maintained a sensible attitude in the matter of academic freedom.

Harvard's motto is Veritas, Truth. Pontius Pilate asked Jesus, "What is truth?" At least it is not deliberate falsehood. Neither is it propaganda. Whenever the aim is not an honest search for the facts of a situation and a fair, honorable, and objective interpretation of those facts we have not truth. With increasing insistence Harvard seeks to realize its motto, to discover and diffuse truth. It is for that reason that a hearing is given to what is considered heretical. That was once needed primarily in religion and it resulted in religious tolerance and the separation of Church and State. Today it is needed primarily in the field of social relations where it is just as difficult to maintain objectivity as it was in the domain of religion in the seventeenth century.

The Harvard tercentenary celebration was not only a national event of great importance, it was international in its influence. Leaders in scholarship from every country in the world assembled at the celebration. They freely discussed problems of the deepest significance; not only problems of physical nature but of society. In this day of intellectual suppression over so large an area in the world, it was heartening to follow their untrammeled discussions. The Harvard celebration thereby rendered an inestimable service to the cause of democracy and liberalism everywhere. Universities and university-trained men must become leaders of public opinion more and more. Unless they maintain the right to think and speak what they believe, training men to guide public opinion is a futility. One can hardly avoid comparing the Harvard Tercentenary celebration with the 550th anniversary of a great university in another country, a celebration devoted partly to condemning the independent search for and diffusion of truth. We rejoice that Harvard is American.

STEPHEN DUGGAN

THE EDUCATIONAL SITUATION IN THE NEAR EAST (PART ONE)

PAUL MONROE, Professor Emeritus of Education, Teachers College, Columbia University

THE educational problem of the Near East is that of all oriental peoples, namely, to adjust the new education of the West to the traditional social structure of the East and through this adjustment to create the basis for a modern national state in a unified nationalistic culture; to substitute a realistic education for a verbalistic one which found all of culture in a religious literature; to affect the entire mass of the population through the technique of modern elementary and popular education; to create and develop a technical education which will affect the fundamental life needs of the people as they now exist.

In every instance the traditional education of the oriental peoples was bound up with their sacred literature. The sacred literature was embodied in forms that were extremely complex and difficult to master. Consequently, the mastery of them was limited to the few of superior intellectual ability who could through interest and economic independence devote a lifetime to this task. The technique and procedure of this education was committed to an ecclesiastical class or to a class of scholars that, in the case of China, was the social substitute for an ecclesiastical class.

The first phase of the adjustment of the modern education of the West to the traditional education of the East is the substitution of the ideals of a secular education for one religious in content and control. Consequently, in almost every instance the first step of the Eastern peoples in making this adjustment to the new is to decree that education should be secularized. This involves the building up of a school system which is secular in content and under the control of political rather than of ecclesiastical authority. As the modern education of the West was first carried to the peoples of the East by those representatives of the West who were moved by religious motives, this transfer involved a conflict which in recent years has become acute in a number of Eastern countries. In the suppression of the traditional education it has been necessary to suppress the established ecclesiastical institutions and the traditional procedure and thus run counter to a large element of public opinion backed by powerful institutions and influences. This suppression can not be accomplished without arousing hostile attitudes affecting the bearers of the new education from the West. Consequently, in turn there have been among all oriental peoples periods of somewhat acute hostility upon the part of the authorities towards those bearers of Western education who first brought its ideals and practices among them.

But it should be realized that this hostility upon the part of the oriental authorities or public toward the religious embodiment of education of the West, or towards those who first brought it amongst them, is not due wholly or in a large part to a hostility to Western religion, that is to Christianity, so much as it is due to a hostility towards ecclesiastical control of education. Ecclesiastical control of education is a status which they must overthrow if they are to make progress in the substitution of a modern education for the traditional one which has enveloped their whole social life.

A second phase of this difficulty in the substitution of the modern Western education for the traditional oriental one is that the traditional education of the East relates primarily to forms of conduct, to social rites, especially as established by the various clerical classes. Education is concerned with meticulous control of the conduct of the masses of the people. The ecclesiastical interpreters of the social literature pass on this knowledge of the forms of conduct to the illiterate masses of the population. The religious discipline of the peoples was concerned very largely with the interpretation and application of these precepts in the minutiæ of conduct. In China this was accomplished largely by the selection of magistrates from those who had proven themselves, by examination as well as by practice, most thorough masters of the traditional literature. In the Moslem countries of the Near East this was accomplished largely through the inclusion of all forms of what in other countries would be civil law, within the limits of the ecclesiastical law; and, through giving into the hands of the educated ecclesiastics the scholars of the mosques, the interpretation of such law and its application to every phase of conduct.

Modern Western education concerns itself little directly with forms of conduct; that is, with daily relations of the individual components of society. It has concerned itself with the understanding and interpretation of the natural environment and with the control of the natural forces. This difference in major point of interest has presented another most difficult problem in the substitution of modern Western education for the traditional one. In the East as elsewhere, with the breakdown, or at least the weakening, of the traditional ideals much of the control of conduct exerted over the masses tends to disappear. It is true that custom, habit, and tradition have profound influences and that their control lingers; but in the East these tend to disappear with the permeation of oriental societies by Western or modern thought. The new education which replaces the old is far less concerned with forms of conduct; so much so that the Orient is prone to look upon the West as more or less barbaric. The Westerner is not concerned with the cultural forms of conduct, which the oriental has been accustomed to look upon as the important content and the chief concern of education. Such a substitution does in fact leave a large gap which becomes apparent when the secularization of the culture of the East has proceeded far enough to break down regard for and even knowledge of forms of conduct; while the new education has supplied a substitute which is wholly inadequate.

The tendency of the leaders of the oriental peoples is to attempt to fill this gap by emphasis upon the national or political aspects of modern education. The ideals and the technique of the political education they have borrowed from the West. But such a substitution proves a very inadequate one because a general political and nationalistic motivation has no such control over the minutiæ of conduct as had the old religious forms of education. Furthermore, again borrowed from the West, this emphasis upon national motivation depends to a large extent for its efficiency upon the cultivation of rivalries, if not downright animosities, towards other similar groups. Consequently, even to the extent to which this elaboration of nationalistic education solves some problems, this procedure creates other problems quite as dangerous or as limiting in their nature and quite as difficult of solution as those which they replace.

OUR COOPERATIVE LECTURE PLAN

MARY L. WAITE, Executive Secretary

THE Institute is embarking upon a new venture this fall. It is the outgrowth of a plan cherished for many years of sending distinguished foreign lecturers to the many small and geographically remote colleges, which because of location and limited budgets have not been able to enjoy the privilege of hearing the splendid men and women whom we have been circuiting among the larger and more centrally located institutions.

Two years ago a small award given the Institute by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation made it possible to send a lecturer to a group of colleges in the southern states without any expense to the institutions visited, save the providing of entertainment during his two-days' stay. Many of our subscribers may have read the report of this visitor, Dr. Karl Polanyi of Vienna, political scientist, author and lecturer. The letters received from presidents and deans of the institutions visited, were ample evidence that the students and faculty alike had enjoyed this experience and were eager that the Institute should send other men in the future to discuss current international problems. Dr. Polanyi's visit in the spring of 1935, was followed in the fall by a visit from Professor Etienne Dennery of the Ecole Libre des Sciences Politiques of Paris, to a group of colleges in the Northwest, and in the winter of 1936, by a visit from Mr. Donald Grant of Edinburgh and London to a group of institutions in the southeastern states. As a result of these visits, the Institute received letters from colleges in other parts of the counry asking if they could not be included in the itinerary of the next lecturer. With the large number of universities and colleges in this country, we realized it would be impossible to furnish this service on the terms of the three visits referred to above. As requests continued to come in, we were obliged to alter our methods and this led to the organization of our Cooperative Lecture Plan.

The plan, briefly stated, contemplates the division of the country into regions, on the basis of the number of institutions of higher education in each. A college president or dean is asked to act as chairman of a region, writing the initial letters to the institutions in the region to interest them in participating in the plan. Each college is asked to contribute a modest honorarium and provide entertainment for the visitor during his stay on the campus of usually two and a half days. Saturdays and Sundays are reserved for such use as the lecturer may wish to make of them, except in the few cases where some travel is needed in order to reach the next campus. When the chairman of the region notifies the Institute which institutions desire to be members of the group, an itinerary is made out and sent to each college so that it will know exactly when the visitor can be expected. If the dates offered are not convenient, as sometimes happens, changes are made to meet the needs of all. There is great advantage in such organization because when the Institute seeks for the best lecturer to send to the group, it knows the total honoraria which can be offered and can also present a completed itinerary to the proposed visitor instead of, as in former years, being obliged to leave the number of places to be visited, the states to be traveled, and the total sum to be received, very much of an enigma.

During the past fifteen years the Institute has circuited distinguished foreigners to lecture in the fields of science, art, history, political science, and many others. However, because of the unprecedented political situation existent in all parts of the world today and the great need that democracies shall train an informed electorate, we have decided that for the present at least, we shall circuit under this cooperative plan only men and women competent to discuss political problems of an international nature. We, in the Institute, hope that our new lecture plan may prove to be a valuable contribution toward the development of an intelligent opinion concerning foreign affairs among American college students and bring about important international contacts as well for the members of the faculties.

INTERNATIONAL HOUSE IN GENEVA

DURING the summer the oldest palace in Geneva, the historic Necker house, became an international house for students. It is located on the site where Bonivard, Bryon's "Prisoner of Chillon" lived before being thrown into the dungeon and where Clothilde lived before she became the Queen of Clovis. The present building was erected in 1702 and has remained in the Necker family since the 18th century. What is now the club room for foreign students was once the celebrated salon of Madame de Staël.

The new International House is under the auspices of the University of Geneva and is directed by Mr. and Mrs. Ian Tullis.

OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGE STUDENTS

JESSIE DOUGLASS, Secretary, Student Bureau

IT has again been the privilege of the Institute of International Education to welcome to this country the foreign students who have received fellowships or scholarships under its auspices for study in the United States. In spite of the changes which are taking place in some of the European universities as to educational ideals, and the financial difficulties which face students everywhere, it has been possible to arrange for the interchange of as large a number of students for the coming year as in the past. For almost three days at International House in New York City, from Friday evening, September eleventh until Monday morning, September fourteenth, there were as guests of the Institute over one hundred foreign students representing several countries of Europe and South America. The largest groups were the French and German, with a few more from France than from Germany. There were also represented Austria, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Hungary, and Switzerland. Arrangements had been made for several Spanish exchanges but owing to prevailing conditions, Spanish students have not been able to reach this country. All the South American countries were represented as well as two Central American countries. As a special appointment we had a young woman from Norway. To list these nationalities gives some idea of the varied types and mentalities which combined to form a most interesting group. The program included addresses to the entire number by Professor Stephen Duggan, Director of the Institute; Dr. Robert L. Kelly, Secretary of the Association of American Colleges; Dr. Edgar J. Fisher, Assistant Director of the Institute; and Mr. Edward R. Murrow, of the Columbia Broadcasting Company, formerly Assistant Director of the Institute. All these men presented different aspects of American life and education, and in order that certain points in American academic life might be especially emphasized and thoroughly understood, group meetings were held and conducted in various languages. Professor Felix Weill, Professor of Romance Languages of the College of the City of New York, spoke in French, Professor John Whyte, Professor of German in Brooklyn College in German, Dr. Howard Marraro of Columbia University in Italian, and Mr. Josef Hanc, a member of the Czechoslovak consulate in New York, in Czechoslovakian. Every student was thus enabled to listen to an informing talk in some language that was more familiar to him than English. Of the social activities of the Conference, one of the most interesting was perhaps the expedition which included a bus ride through New York and a boat trip around the island of Manhattan. A reception, a tea, a dance, a concert of negro spirituals and an impromptu entertainment by the students completed the round of activities. By the time the Conference was over and the students separated for their various colleges and universities, located in all sections of the country, many friendships had been formed and the newcomers realized that they were no longer strangers but a welcome addition to the student body of the United States.

INSTITUTE LECTURERS

Dr. J. B. Condliffe, editor of the annual World Economic Survey of the League of Nations, will visit New Zealand with his family this fall. Upon his return the last of January, 1937, he will be available for lectures on his way across the United States. He expects to arrive in Los Angeles on January 23rd and sail from New York on February 24th. Dr. Condliffe has accepted a chair at the London School of Economics beginning October 1, 1937.

Lecture Subjects

1. Economic Nationalism in an International World
2. The Elements of Economic Recovery
3. International Aspects of Monetary Policy
4. Economic Experiment in New Zealand

Professor Bernard Faÿ, of the Collège de France, has been in the country for several weeks, having come over to attend the Harvard Tercentenary Celebration. During the months of October and November Professor Faÿ will be available for lecture engagements. The first three weeks of December he will lecture at the Des Moines Public Forums.

Lecture Subjects

1. Communism in 1936
2. The Balance Sheet of Dictatorship in 1936
3. The Conflict between Democracy and Science
4. The Rise of Liberalism and the Franco-American School (1778-1850)
5. The Meaning and Action of Freemasonry in the 18th Century
6. Poetry in the Modern World
7. American Prose, Its National and International Meaning

Mr. Harrison Brown of London, journalist and lecturer, left England last spring for a visit to the Scandinavian countries, Russia, China, Japan and the Philippine Islands. Mr. Brown will arrive in British Columbia this fall and will be available for a few lectures in California during the month of December. Beginning February 1, 1937, he is engaged to lecture in Washington, Oregon and Idaho to a group of colleges and universities on the Institute's Cooperative Lecture Plan.

*Lecture Subjects

1. The Far Eastern Situation
2. Russia in 1936
3. The Rôle of Youth in an Age of Transition
4. European Problems
5. The Inter-relation of Pacific and European Problems

Mr. Ameen Rihani of the Lebanon, Syria, author, lecturer and traveler, received his education in the United States. Mr. Rihani occupies a unique position as interpreter of the Arabian Near East to America. He speaks of the Arab world and its problems with authority and comprehensive understanding. Mr. Rihani has spent an extended period as the guest of Ibn Sa'oud in Sa'oudi Arabia. Publications: Makers of Modern Arabia; Around the Coasts of Arabia; History of Modern Nejd and Ibn Sa'oud. From February 1 to May 5, 1937, Mr. Rihani will visit a group of colleges under the Cooperative Lecture Plan in Kentucky, Indiana and West Virginia. He will be available for lectures elsewhere during the month of January and the early summer months.

Lecture Subjects

1. The Holy Land Between Three Fires
2. The Economic Developments in Sa'oudi Arabia
3. The Economic Phase of the Mandate in Syria and Mt. Lebanon
4. The Alliance Between Iraq and Sa'oudi Arabia (The Corner Stone of an Arab Confederation)

---

* Mr. Brown felt it was impossible to give lecture subjects so long in advance but suggested those listed subject to amendment this fall.

CHILEAN SCHOLARSHIPS FOR TRAVEL AND STUDY

Two scholarships will be available to American students for study at the forthcoming summer school session of the University of Chile, which extends from January 2 to February 1, 1937. The offer is made by the Chilean government and includes exemption from the payment of tuition, the sum of 900 Chilean pesos for living expenses in Chile, and a pass on the railroads for a complete tour of the national territory.

Twenty-nine similar scholarships are being offered by the Chilean government to the other American Republics, two each to the larger countries and one each to the smaller countries.

The Institute of International Education, realizing that the considerable expense of the trip to Chile would prevent many qualified students from making application, presented this matter to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, which has agreed to supplement the scholarships for students from this country in order to cover the cost of travel to Chile and return. The amount granted to each student will be $500.

The special January session of the University of Chile, which takes place during the Chilean summer, is intended for mature students desiring to broaden their general culture or to go further in certain special fields. It was held for the first time in January 1936, when the students numbered 534, including sixteen from foreign countries. The forthcoming summer school, as a result of the scholarships, is expected to attract many more persons from countries other than Chile and to furnish an excellent opportunity to promote better international understanding.

The offer of the two scholarships was made by the Chilean Ambassador in Washington to our Department of State, which has been requested to designate the recipients of the scholarships. The Institute of International Education has been asked by the Department of State to give publicity to the matter and to nominate candidates. Those interested in making application should address the Institute of International Education, 2 West 45th Street, New York City, at the earliest opportunity since the appointments will be made the first of November. An applicant must have a practical reading, writing and speaking knowledge of Spanish and must be a graduate of an American college, university or professional school of recognized standing.

NEW INSTITUTE PUBLICATIONS

UNDER the title of "Discussion of International Problems with Students in the South," the Institute has published the report of the visit under its auspices made by Mr. Donald Grant to a group of southern colleges. This is the third report of such extramural lectures. The first report was by Dr. Karl Polanyi, political scientist and foreign editor of "Der Osterreichische Volkswirt" of Vienna, entitled "Reflections on a Visit to Southern Colleges"; and the second report was written by Professor Etienne Dennery of the Ecole Libre des Sciences Politiques of Paris, on "A French Economist's Visit to Western Colleges." Mr. Grant, who is a graduate of New College, Edinburgh, has followed student work closely in Europe and Asia since the World War, and in recent years has been an effective writer and lecturer on international affairs. This pamphlet is available upon request.

There has just been issued the sixth edition of the bulletin Fellowships and Scholarships Open to Foreign Students for Study in the United States. As in previous editions, an attempt has been made to include only those grants for which a foreign student may apply with some chance of success. Price twenty-five cents.

The Seventeenth Annual Report of the Director will be published October fifteenth and will be available at the Institute upon request.

PROFESSOR MARGARET B. HOLZ

It was with a profound sense of loss that the Institute received the news of the death in Austria on September sixth of Miss Margaret B. Holz who had been for many years the head of the foreign language department at New Jersey State Teachers College in Montclair. It was due to her energy and initiative that funds were raised in the fall of 1929 for the interchange of students between her college and Europe. Since that time seventy-three students of the college have been assisted for a year of study abroad, forty going to France, eleven to Germany, nine to Spain, one to Switzerland, three to Mexico and nine to Austria. Twenty-one foreign students have visited Montclair; seven from France, five from Germany, three from Spain, three from Mexico and three from Austria. The students from abroad have been provided with fellowships by Montclair and the Institute has had the privilege of nominating candidates from its exchange countries, i.e. France, Austria and Germany. This cooperation in the exchange of students between the Institute and Miss Holz has been of a most cordial and friendly nature. It is difficult to think of the continuance of this work at New Jersey State Teachers College without the energetic and inspiring leadership of this gifted and able woman.

INSTITUTE ALUMNI NOTES

CORNELIA M. ANDERSON (University of Berlin, 1931-32) was selected for the second successive year by the faculty of Barnard College as the winner of the $1,300 fellowship established by the Woman's Organization for National Prohibition Reform which, since the repeal of prohibition, has been used to train women for public service. Miss Anderson made a study of Boston labor market conditions during her post-graduate work at Radcliffe College and has made a similar study in England during the past summer.

FRANK MONAGHAN (University of Paris, 1929-30), instructor in History at Yale University and fellow of Calhoun College, has been appointed a Knight of the Legion of Honour by the government of France. Dr. Monaghan is Secretary of the American editorial board of the new Franco-American Review, published by the Yale University Press. Last June Dr. Monaghan was awarded the doctor's degree from Yale University on the basis of his book "John Jay, Defender of Liberty," and in September he received the Médaille de L'Union des Combattants because of his book "French Travelers in the United States."

JOSEPH L. SVIRBELY (University of Szeged, Hungary, 1931-33) of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, delivered a report of his studies on Vitamin C at the meeting of the American Chemical Society held last month in Pittsburgh.

SIGISMUND VON BRAUN (University of Cincinnati, 1933-34) has been appointed a member of the staff of the German Foreign Office.

R. H. EDWIN ESPY (University of Tübingen, 1933-34) has been appointed Secretary in charge of the Youth Commission of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches with offices at 41, Avenue de Champel, Geneva. Mr. Espy is the first person to fill this position.

NOTES

During the past summer the rank of Officer of the Legion of Honour was conferred upon Professor Duggan, the Director of the Institute of International Education, by the President of the French Republic.

During the past summer Utrecht University in Holland celebrated its tercentenary and London University its centenary.

MARCEL AUBERT, Director of the Société Française d'Archéologie in Paris, will be Visiting Professor of the History of Art at Yale University this fall and, during the months of October and November, will be available to lecture at neighboring institutions on the following subjects: Les cathédrales de France; Les vieilles abbayes et les vieux chateaux de France; Le vitrail en France au moyen âge; La sculpture au moyen âge.

FREDERICK MAURICE POWICKE, Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford University, and DAVID NICHOL SMITH, Merton Professor of English Literature at Oxford, will be visiting scholars at the Huntington Library in San Marino, California, for several months this fall.

The first National Conference on Educational Broadcasting will be held in Washington, D. C., December 10-12. The Conference is sponsored by a group of organizations representing important phases of American education and is held in cooperation with the United States Office of Education and the Federal Communications Commission. The purpose of the meeting is to enable the large number of persons who are interested in educational broadcasting to discuss means by which radio may become a more effective instrument for education; to serve as a clearing house for information on the latest technical and professional developments in educational broadcasting; and to enable persons representing all phases of the subject to become acquainted and to exchange ideas and experiences. Government officials and prominent educators from the United States and foreign countries will take part, and educational broadcasting in other countries will be discussed.

All organizations interested in radio as a social force are invited to participate and may receive further information from Dr. C. S. Marsh of the American Council on Education, 744 Jackson Place, Washington, D. C., the Executive Secretary for the Planning Committee.

The Society for the Protection of Science and Learning is to be the permanent successor to the Academic Assistance Council, which was established in London in 1933 as a temporary organization to assist scholars and scientists who, on grounds of religion, race, or opinion, were unable to continue their work in their own country.

DR. FRITZ KARL MANN, Professor Emeritus of the University of Cologne, is to be in the United States during the present academic year and will be available for lectures in the field of political economy. Professor Mann took his Ph.D. at the University of Berlin and became privatdozent at the University of Kiel. After the war he acted as political and economic expert of the Supreme War Council for the Balkan States; became a member of the German Peace Delegation in Roumania, and President of the Interallied Danube Distribution Board. He was Professor of Economics at the University of Kiel (1920-22), at the University of Koenigsberg (1922-26), and at the University of Cologne (1926-35). Professor Mann will lecture on the following topics: Economic Planning in Europe; Significance of Mercantilism Today; Public Finance. He may be reached in care of the Columbia University Club, 4 West 43rd Street, New York City.

The newly-appointed Minister of Education of Czechoslovakia, Dr. Emil Franke, recently stated in his Report to the Chamber of Deputies that, in accordance with his educational program, it is proposed to commence the teaching of English in all Czechoslovak secondary schools, reform secondary schools, and technical secondary schools or technical high schools (Real-gymnasien, Reformrealgymnasien, and Realschulen).

This instruction will either be adopted on trial or in a course in which English and French are alternately taught, or as an optional choice between English and French; and will be put into effect in July, 1937.

PROFESSOR LÉON LEMONNIER, Agrégé de l'Université and Docteur ès Lettres, who is now Chargé de Conférences at the Sorbonne, is to be Visiting Professor at the University of Buffalo the first semester of this academic year. Professor Lemonnier will be available week-ends for lectures in the vicinity of Buffalo. His lecture subjects are as follows: The Origins of European Realism (8 lectures in French or English); Le Roman realiste en France au XIXe Siècle (8 lectures); Le Théâtre Contemporain (10 lectures); L'Influence d'Edgar Allen Poe sur les Conteurs Français (6 lectures); L'Oeuvre d'Oscar Wilde (6 lectures); La Foire Aux Vanités de Thackeray (12 lectures); Dickens (single lecture): Populisme (single lecture in French or English).

PROFESSOR F. SCHOENEMANN of the University of Berlin is to be Visiting Professor at the University of Nebraska the first semester of this year. From February until the end of the academic year he will be available for lectures on the following subjects: Trends in Contemporary German Education, Problems of Modern German Literature, The New German Woman, National Socialism as a Cultural Movement. Professor Schoenemann may be addressed in care of the University of Nebraska, Lincoln, Nebraska.

A treaty of cultural cooperation was signed during the past summer between Germany and Hungary. Among other activities agreed upon were the following: an exchange of professors and of college assistants; exchange of students and the establishment of student camps in which youth of both countries will take part.

WALTER LANDÉ, former member of the Prussian Ministry of Education and Lecturer at the University of Berlin, will lecture at the College of the City of New York and at Brooklyn College the first semester of this year. After February 1, he will be available for lectures at other institutions. His lecture subjects include: State and School as a General Problem of Political Science; Comparison of American and European School Systems; Freedom in Education; What became of the American Bill of Rights in Continental Europe? The Relationship between State and Church in Europe. Further information may be secured from Mr. Landé at 17 West 94th Street, New York City.

The Aims, Methods and Activity of the League of Nations. Geneva, Secretariat of the League of Nations.

This small volume gives a brief account of the origin of the League of Nations and of its organization, methods and achievements. At this time when the League has sustained two major humiliating defeats and when its critics have pronounced its obituary, it is useful to recount the ideals which gave birth to the League and to indicate its substantial if unobtrusive accomplishments.

In the first part of this volume a description is given of the organization of the machinery of the League and its methods of operation. There follows an account of the measure of the League's achievement. No attempt is made to minimize the failures, notably in the Manchurian and Ethiopian controversies and in the efforts to bring about limitation of armaments. On the other hand attention is drawn to the successful efforts of the League in adjusting a number of international disputes that might have developed into serious crises.

However discouraging the work of the League has been in settling international controversies, its activities along other lines have more than justified its existence. Notable among these activities have been the promotion of health through research work on various diseases, encouragement of international intellectual cooperation, and social and humanitarian work.

A brief account is given of the associated international organizations, the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Labor Organization.

The conclusion reached in this short treatise that "the shortcomings (of the League) are not in the instrument itself, but in the peoples and their governments, who, even with the best intentions, are too often held back by timidity, by routine, by prejudice, and cannot see where their duty lies, or are not prepared to do it" is hardly open to dispute.

NELSON P. MEAD, College of the City of New York.

Every five years the University Grants Committee of Great Britain makes a Report covering the five preceding years, giving an account of salient developments and discussing needs and problems confronting British universities. In its Report covering the period 1929-30 to 1934-35, recently published, the University Grants Committee stated that although there had been an increase in attendance of full-time students from 44,000 in 1929 to 50,000, the question of unemployment among graduates is not yet a real problem in England, but that the position is much less favorable in Scotland and Wales. In England there is one university student for every 1,147 of the population, in Switzerland one for every 387, and in the United States one for every 125. Approximately 42 percent of the total number of British university students are assisted by scholarships or grants and during the period covered by the Report the increase in endowments and benefactions amounted to £5,250,000. One great danger described in the Report was that of the compulsory lecture system and the need for the extension of the "seminar system" or "group tutorial" method, especially in the newer universities, for the purpose of bringing about closer relations between teachers and students, which has long been traditional in the older institutions of learning. More adequate students' unions and additional university hostels for the newer universities were also advocated.

In making a considerably increased grant to the University Grants Committee for the next five years, the Chancellor emphasized that the British universities form a system of autonomous organizations "with deeply rooted traditions of academic freedom, independence, and freedom from State control."

Gen. Eisenhower's Naval Aide Lights Up a Very Personal War

MY THREE YEARS WITH EISENHOWER
The Personal Diary of Captain Harry C. Butcher, U. S. N. R., Naval Aide to General Eisenhower, 1942 to 1945. . . . 910 pp. . . . New York: Simon and Schuster. . . . $5.

Reviewed by
EDWARD R. MURROW
Vice-President and Director of Public Affairs of Columbia Broadcasting System

IT WAS a strangely personal war. Historians for years to come will argue about the personal relationships between commanders and politicians, and the effect of those relationships upon grand strategy. No one today can estimate with accuracy the importance of the contributions made by such men as Harry Hopkins, General Sir Hastings Ismay, Robert Murphy and all the rest. Each man was the prisoner of his own indoctrination and experience. That was an essential part of the equipment he carried into battle.

Captain Harry C. Butcher held a unique and indeed unprecedented position. He was naval aide to General Eisenhower, and he spent the war surrounded by "brass" and "scrambled eggs." He never ran out of his favorite Burns Panatelas—"living conditions were always better than tolerable." You will find in this book none of the sand, suffering and sadness of a North African campaign; none of the bitter, bloody fighting in the Normandy hedges. This is a headquarters document.

When Eisenhower and Butcher arrived in London, English friends asked, "Who is this chap Butcher?" He was in the uniform of a lieutenant commander of the United States Navy. He was obviously on intimate terms with the general. It was clear, even to the casual observer, that he was no professional man of war. His understanding of military etiquette was not all that it might have been. I remember one occasion when at a party attended by considerable "brass" Butcher looked at his watch, touched the general on the sleeve, and said, "Come on, Ike, we've got to be going." It became clear that Eisenhower brought Butcher with him because he liked him, because he was discreet, convivial, a good listener, and knew a lot about public relations. His position baffled the British, but they liked him too.

It was part of Butcher's job to keep a diary. Before the end it reached about a million words. After editing, the part now published remains about 640,000 words, most of them small, because, as Butcher says, he doesn't know very many big ones.

Names that made headlines during the war—and a lot that didn't—parade through the eight hundred and seventy-six pages of Captain Butcher's diary. He was more interested in people than in grand strategy. Unfortunately, few of the people emerge as clear-cut characters, recognizable through the haze of words and trivial incidents. This is true even of General Eisenhower. But we gather a great deal of interest about him. We see him at times impatient, "pushing on the reins," at times irritated by the slowness of the Combined Chiefs of Staffs, or relaxing with his favorite reading (Western stories). We observe, through Butcher's eyes, his reactions to Roosevelt, Churchill, De Gaulle and all the others who controlled the destiny of nations. We learn of his determination to make the greatest combined operation of all time a success. We understand that Eisenhower wrote his own speeches and that he had a gift from the gods of war which permitted him to inspire confidence in his troops and respect in his commanders. We are even permitted to read a communique written but never issued by General Eisenhower. It was dated June 5:

General Eisenhower

From the frontispiece of "My Three Years With Eisenhower"

"Our landings in the Cherbourg-Havre area have failed to gain a satisfactory foothold and I have withdrawn the troops. My decision to attack at this time and place was based upon the best information available. The troops, the air, and the Navy did all that bravery and devotion to duty could do. If any blame or fault attaches to the attempt it is mine alone."

Captain Harry C. Butcher Halsman

General Eisenhower is a modest and indeed a humble man. When he first arrived in England he remarked: "This war isn't being fought to make a hot-shot out of Ike Eisenhower." The Supreme Commander never sought personal publicity, never failed to admit his errors and never failed to advance and defend his policies with vigor and, occasionally, with profanity. Eisenhower was more than life size. Captain Butcher shows him as a chairman without equal in his ability to secure agreement between men of divers nationalities and training; but Eisenhower the man is not as clearly pictured as we have the right to expect.

The entries in the diary during the North African operation are revealing. They tend to prove that the political planning was inadequate, that Admiral Darlan ordered the cease fire when it was ceasing of its own accord. Moreover, it is to be noted that there is, curiously enough, no reference to the effort of A. F. H. Q. to impose a purely political censorship in regard to the Darlan situation. There is one sentence showing really monumental understatement: "By Saturday morning Ike had a cable from Beetle in London, saying the deal was being coolly received." Is it possible that General Bedell Smith was such an inaccurate or indifferent reporter? There was in Britain at that time a sense of revulsion in the Parliament and in the pubs that had not been equaled since Hoare and Laval. Captain Butcher's carefully edited diary defense is scarcely more convincing than were the explanations offered at the time. The author concludes that there was a "miserable press situation at home where a handful of columnists, commentators and other newspaper people have thrown a lot of sand over the Darlan deal."

He calls Darlan's letter to General Eisenhower in which the admiral complained of President Roosevelt's premature letdown of his regime on the grounds of military necessity "rather pathetic"—Churchill called it "pathetic and dignified." It is permissible to wonder whether the French hostages turned over by Darlan to the Germans and the slave labor sent to Germany from France regarded Admiral Darlan as pathetic. Incidentally, Marshall's comment on the Darlan letter for the United States is described as more "hold-backish."

Butcher reports Elmer Davis, chief of the O. W. I., as crying desperately for constructive material with which to beat off the critical columnists, radio commentators, "and even respectable people." I wonder if Davis stated his requirements in exactly that fashion. My memory is that Mr. Davis was trying to secure, without much success, some information as to just what Allied policy in North Africa was. The Army doesn't like criticism, and, in this instance at least, the Navy, in the person of Captain Butcher, was in enthusiastic agreement.

There is about this diary a frankness and informality which is refreshing, but there is reflected at the same time a lack of awareness of basic issues. It would have been interesting had the author seen fit to illuminate the considerations that were involved in arriving at vital and fatal decisions, rather than to devote so much space to the comings and goings of V. I. P.s, the playing of poker and the consumption of alcohol. These were understandable and enjoyable forms of relaxation, but it may be doubted that they contributed materially to the conduct of the war.

The diary contains a considerable amount of unpublished material. There are many revealing glimpses of Allied commanders. The boldness and the bombast of Patton is there. So, too, is the whimsical, civilized humor of Tedder. Captain Butcher reveals that Eisenhower was, from the beginning, opposed to unconditional surrender. Butcher's reporting of the friction between Montgomery and Eisenhower is impeccable, and even the British are unlikely to object. The British MALCOLM BINGAY, the veteran Detroit editor and reporter, who probably deserves the title of Detroit's most articulate citizen, has turned out an eminently readable, breezy and anecdotal study of his home town. The story of Detroit, as seen by Bingay, is simply reeking with drama.

Aware though he seems to be of some of the town's problems and shortcomings, he is, first of all, a Detroit booster. He actually loves the place. In his own lifetime he has seen Detroit become what it is. Mr. Bingay, who is editorial director of "The Detroit Free Press," author of a popular column of general comment and inventor of a singularly successful sports commentator known as "Iffy the Dopester," is a man of endless energy, and he writes with something of the speed which characterizes his favorite town.

The author pays his respects to many remarkable personalities, and for the overwhelming majority he has little but praise. However, friendly booster though he is, he is no sycophant. He simply happens to have a vast respect for those imaginative, often ruthless strong men who built Detroit.

Mr. Bingay's gallery of Detroit notables is long and varied: There is, of course, the Old Master, Henry Ford, about whom Mr. Bingay tells many anecdotes. He does not pretend to understand Mr. Ford—indeed, he regards him as so remarkable that he is virtually beyond ordinary human comprehension—but he does tell much of how Ford's mind works.

Here also are stories of William C. Durant, the game little man who founded General Motors, became one of America's most astonishing speculators, and wound up broke; of Charles F. Kettering, the tinkering genius who invented the self-starter; of Albert H. Kahn, the architect who revolutionized the design of large factory buildings; of the late Senator James Couzens, the rich man who once had been a partner of Henry Ford and who all his life seemed to distrust the motives of his fellowmen (Mr. Bingay's comments on Couzens, by the way, are among the most penetrating in the book); of Eddie Guest, Detroit's popular versifier who is one of the city's heroes and a very amiable fellow, at that; of that able and agreeable former newspaper man, Charles A. Hughes, who has made such a success of the "Detroit Athletic Club News." And there are many, many others—automobile men, odd characters, sportsmen and politicians. Mr. Bingay even includes revealing glimpses of some of Detroit's Founding Fathers, way back yonder.

Not one to forget his old pals, Mr. Bingay puts in a generous plug for Clarence Budington Kelland, the writer and politician, and Gene Buck, song writer and the pride of Great Neck, both of whom were Detroit boys who went elsewhere and made good. He places a high estimate upon the character of Joe Louis, the heavyweight champion, another Detroit product.

Fittingly enough, Mr. Bingay, an old sports writer himself, recog- Athletic Club [illegible] men. And down through the years the doings of that hard-fighting, fiery baseball club the Detroit Tigers has made news. Mr. Bingay tells much of the history of the Tigers and quite properly devotes considerable space to the immortal Tyrus Raymond Cobb, who for so many years was Mr. Baseball, certainly so far as Detroit was concerned. Cobb, a speedster, a taker of fantastic chances, endowed with a competi- the rabble-rousing priest was denouncing Wall Street and stock speculation.

Of the future Mr. Bingay has this to say: "What the Detroit of fifty years from now will be we do not know. But one thing is certain: it will be dynamic. It is a destiny we cannot escape. The lads from the machine shops and the designing boards, the laboratories and the assembly lines will take the atom in their stride."

IT IS probable that when two emissaries of Kamehameha III on December 5, 1842, approached Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State, with a request that America guarantee the independence of the Kingdom of Hawaii they already foresaw the inevitable absorption of the islands by some major power. Missionaries, traders, sailormen, adventurers of several nations had gathered at Honolulu and were struggling for power and profit. Most were selfish grabbers, but a few unconsciously determined, Prof[illegible] Sylvester Stevens carries the story [illegible] —but Congress either ignored or rejected such requests. There were too many irons in the fire on the continent to bother about a group of far-away islands.

It is not a pretty story, but one that, fortunately, ended well. The author has devoted years to a study of records and documents and presents a detailed, chronological and scholarly account of the gradual growth of American influence which resulted in Hawaii becoming a territory. An invaluable contribution to one of the sideshows of our history.

general's excessive caution, his reluctance to move until he had amassed an overwhelming number of guns and men, was the subject of frequent criticism in the British war cabinet. Butcher's diary reflects Eisenhower's objectivity and his desire to distribute praise and blame without regard to nationality.

The diary also contains a great deal of trivia which is interesting and amusing to those of us who were occasionally admitted behind the scenes. This material, it is true, is unlikely to contribute very much to the reader's fundamental understanding of the persons and policies which determined how the tide of battle flowed, but it will add human interest to more serious study.

Captain Butcher's revelations regarding the activities of that indestructible, juvenile and able man of war Winston Churchill confirm comments by high-ranking British officers. Mr. Churchill's concept of grand strategy was wrong more often than it was right. He was disposed, on more than one occasion, to attempt to interfere in strategy, and even tactics, and General Eisenhower's handling of this brilliant and at times inspired statesman is an abiding lesson in the art of diplomacy. Mr. Churchill wanted to go across to Normandy on D-Day, and he wanted to do a lot of other things which, by combination of tact and plain talk, General Eisenhower prevented him from doing. Britain's war-time Prime Minister was not fond of opposition; nevertheless, he probably has more respect, admiration and affection for Eisenhower than for any man who wore an Allied uniform during this war.

Long as this book is, I regret that Captain Butcher did not include General Eisenhower's Guild Hall speech on [illegible] 13, 1945. It was, in my estimation, the finest utterance of any soldier of our day.

But the diary does include an appealing little incident that occurred very shortly after General Eisenhower reached London. He visited Windsor Castle one afternoon, and while walking through the grounds was observed by the King and Queen. Crouching behind a hedge, their Majesties made their way back into the palace through a low opening in the wall so that the general might not see them and feel that his few hours of relaxation had been interrupted by the formalities which would have been necessary had they met face to face.

Captain Butcher was not appointed naval aide to the supreme commander by virtue of his literary abilities, but he has produced a readable diary which nevertheless has in it the shortcomings of many diaries written under pressure and subsequently printed and pressed between cardboard covers. He is no profound student of strategy or international affairs. However, his contribution as a catalytic agent serving to bring together junior staff officers of different nationalities was more considerable than appears in the diary. His devotion to General Eisenhower, his assistance to war correspondents, his unfailing good humor and inexhaustible supply of good stories will cause him to be remembered with affection by those of us who saw him in the anteroom of the "ivory tower."

Personal

Dear General Eisenhower:

This is personal and may even be presumptious, but I can at least make it brief.

Last week I spent some time in Philadelphia and was informed by several leaders of the community that they greatly desired you to come there and talk at the opening of their Community Chest campaign on the evening of November 6th. The meeting will be held in Convention Hall and the attendance is likely to be between fifteen and twenty thousand.

I have repeatedly refused to bother you with correspondence or phone calls, although many people have mistakenly assumed that I might intercede in their behalf to persuade you to fill a speaking engagement. I venture to do so now only because of the unusual distinction of those Philadelphians who are anxious to have you come—McLean of the Bulletin who is also president of the Associated Press, the Levy brothers, and many others. There is also a selfish reason behind this letter and it is this: having read every speech you have made during the last three years, I would like to read another.

Should you be disposed to comply with this request, one of the gentlemen in Philadelphia will, of course, be willing and anxious to come to Washington to discuss the details with your.

Sincerely yours,

Edward R. Murrow

WASHINGTON

26 September 1947

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As General Eisenhower is away and will not be returning to Washington until the early part of October, I am acknowledging your very cordial letter.

Unfortunately, the General is faced with a formidable schedule and will just be returning from a trip to the Southwest. In anticipation of the accumulation of urgent official matters which will await him here, he cannot possibly go to Philadelphia for the opening of the Community Chest Campaign.

Many thanks for your courtesy and consideration. I shall show your letter to the General when he is back at his desk.

Sincerely yours,

Notes for Inaugural Address

By President Dwight D. Eisenhower

Columbia University, October 12, 1948

Never in her long history has any honor come to Columbia greater than that accorded her by this gathering of her friends. No other testimony could more convincingly demonstrate universal respect for this university as a fruitful agent in the promotion of human knowledge and human welfare. Among you are men and women from the learned professions, from the offices of management and finance, from labor unions, from the machines of factories, from the shops of small towns, from the farms and the plain homes of America. No school, narrow in its outlook, fearful of the new, bogged down in sterile allegiance to the past, could provoke such a diverse assembly as is this.

Columbia welcomes you and will record with lasting pride the tribute of your presence.

I feel a sense of high personal distinction that I am privileged to participate in this ceremony. If this were a land where the military profession is a weapon of tyranny or aggression—its members an elite caste dedicated to its own perpetuation—a life-long soldier could hardly assume my present role. But in our nation the army is the servant of the people, designed and trained exclusively to protect our way of life. Duty in its ranks is an exercise of citizenship. Hence, among us, the soldier who becomes an educator or the teacher who becomes a soldier enters no foreign field but finds himself instead engaged in a new phase of his fundamental life purpose—the protection and perpetuation of basic human freedoms.

Today's challenge to freedom and to every free institution is such that none of us dares stand alone. For human freedom is today threatened by regimented statism. The threat is infinitely more than that involved in opposing ideologies. Men of widely divergent views in our own country live in peace together because they share certain common aspirations which are more important to them than their differences. But democracy and the police state have no common purposes, methods, or aspirations. In today's struggle, no free man, no free institution can be neutral. All must be joined in a common profession—that of democratic citizenship; every institution within our national structure must contribute to the advancement of this profession.

The common responsibility of all Americans is to become effective, helpful participants in a way of life that blends and harmonizes the fiercely competitive demands of the individual and of society. The individual must be free, able to develop to the utmost of his ability, employing all opportunities that confront him for his own and his family's welfare; otherwise he is merely a cog in a machine. The society must be stable, assured against violent upheaval and revolution; otherwise it is nothing but a temporary truce with chaos. But freedom for the individual must never degenerate into the brutish struggle for survival that we call barbarism. Neither must the stability of society ever degenerate into the enchained servitude of the masses that we call statism.

Only when each individual, while seeking to develop his own talents and further his own good, at the same time protects his fellows against injury and cooperates with them for the common ~~betterment~~ good—only then is the fullness of orderly, civilized life possible to the millions of men who live within a free nation.

The citizenship, which enables us to enjoy this fullness, is our most priceless heritage. By our possession and wise use of it, we enjoy freedom of body, intellect, and spirit, and in addition material richness beyond the boast of Babylon. To insure its perpetuation and proper use is the first function of our educational system.

To blend, without coercion, the individual good and the common good is the essence of citizenship in a free country. This is truly an art whose principles must be learned. Like the other arts, perfection in its manifold details can never be attained. This makes it all the more necessary that its basic principles be understood in order that their application may keep pace with every change—natural, technological, social.

Democratic citizenship is concerned with the sum total of human relations. Here at home this includes the recognition of mutual dependence for liberty, livelihood and existence of more than 140 million human beings. Moreover, since we cannot isolate ourselves as a nation from the world, citizenship must be concerned too with the ceaseless impact of the globe's two billion humans upon one another, manifested in all the multitudinous acts and hopes and fears of humanity. 12:00

The educational system, therefore, can scarcely impose any logical limit upon its functions and responsibilities in preparing students for a life of social usefulness and individual satisfaction. The academic range must involve the entire material, intellectual, and spiritual aspects of life.

Underlying this structure of knowledge and understanding is one immutable, incontestable fact: Time and again, over the span of the last 700 years, it has been proved that those who know our way of life place upon one thing greater value than upon any other—and that priceless thing is individual liberty. This requires a system of self-government, which recognizes that every person possesses certain inalienable rights and that rules and regulation for the common good may be imposed only by the ultimate authority of the citizens themselves. 13:00

This individual freedom is not the product of accident. To gain and retain it our forefathers have sacrificed material wealth, have undergone suffering, indeed have given life itself. So it is with us today.

But it is not enough merely to realize how freedom has been won. Essential also is it that we be ever alert to all threats to that freedom. Easy to recognize is the threat from without. Easy too is it to see the threat of those who advocate its destruction from within. Less easy is it to see the dangers that arise from our own failure to analyze and understand the implications of various economic, social, and political movements among ourselves.

10:05

Thus, one danger arises from too great a concentration of power in the hands of any individual or group: The power of concentrated finance, the power of selfish pressure groups, the power of any class organized in opposition to the whole—anyone of these, when allowed to dominate is fully capable of destroying individual freedom as is power concentrated in the political head of the state.

The concentration of too much power in centralized government need not be the result of violent revolution or great upheaval. A paternalistic government can gradually destroy, by suffocation in the immediate advantage of subsidy, the will of a people to maintain a high degree of individual responsibility. And the abdication of individual responsibility is inevitably followed by further concentration of power in the state. Government ownership or control of property is not to be decried principally because of the historic inefficiency of governmental management of productive enterprises; its real threat rests in the fact that, if carried to the logical extreme, the final concentration of ownership in the hands of government gives to it, in all practical effects, absolute power over our lives. 15:30

There are internal dangers that require eternal vigilance if they are to be avoided. If we permit extremes of wealth for a few and enduring poverty for many, we shall create social explosiveness and a demand for revolutionary change. If we do not eliminate selfish abuse of power by any one group, we can be certain that equally selfish retaliation by other groups will ensue. Never must we forget that ready cooperation in the solution of human problems is the only sure way to avoid forced governmental intervention.

All our cherished rights—the right of free speech, free worship, ownership of property, equality before the law—all these are mutually dependent for their existence. Thus, when shallow critics denounce the profit motive inherent in our system of private enterprise, they ignore the fact that it is an economic support of every human right we possess and that without it, all rights would soon disappear. Demagoguery, unless combatted by truth, can become as great a danger to freedom as exists in any other threat. 17:00

It was loss of unity through demagogic appeals to class selfishness, greed, and hate that Macaulay, the English historian, feared would lead to the extinction of our democratic form of government. More than ninety years ago he wrote of these fears to the American historian, H. S. Randall. In a letter of May 23, 1857 he said, ".... when a society has entered on this downward progress, either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Caesar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand; or your republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the Twentieth Century as the Roman Empire was in the Fifth;—with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals who ravaged the Roman Empire came from without, and that your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own country by your own institutions." 17:45 18:00

That day shall never come if in our educational system we help our students gain a true understanding of our society, of the need for balance between individual desires and the general welfare, and of the imperative requirement that every citizen participate intelligently and effectively in democratic affairs. The broadest possible citizen understanding and responsibility is as necessary in our complex society as was mere literacy before the industrial revolution.

It follows, then, that every institution built by free men, including great universities, must be first of all concerned with the preservation and further development of human freedom—despite any contrary philosophy, or force that may be pitted against it.

At all levels of education, we must be constantly watchful that our schools do not become so engrossed in techniques, great varieties of fractionalized courses, highly specialized knowledge, and the size of their physical plant as to forget the principal purpose of education itself—to prepare the student for an effective personal and social life in a free society. From the school at the crossroads to a university as great as Columbia, general education for citizenship must be the common and first purpose of them all.

I do not suggest less emphasis on pure research or on vocational or professional training; nor am I by any means suggesting that curricula should be reduced to the classical education of the nineteenth century. But I deeply believe that all of us must demand of our schools more emphasis on those fundamentals that make our free society what it is and that assure it boundless increase in the future if we comprehend and apply them.

Love of freedom, confidence in the efficacy of cooperative effort, optimism for the future, invincible conviction that the American way of life yields the greatest human values—to help the student build these attitudes not out of indoctrination but out of genuine understanding, may seem to some to be education in the obvious.

Of course, the reverse is true. There is a growing doubt among our people that democracy is able to cope with the social and economic trials that lie ahead. Among some is a stark fear that our way of life may succumb to the combined effects of creeping paralysis from within and aggressive assault from without.

Fear of the future with a concomitant sense of insecurity and doubt of the validity of fundamental principles is a terrible development in American life—almost incredible in the immediate aftermath of America's most magnificent physical and spiritual triumphs. Only by education in the apparently obvious can doubt and fear be resolved.

Here lies a heavy obligation on Columbia University and all her sister schools; unless such fear is banished from our thinking, the sequel will be either the heavy curse of tyrannical regimentation or the collapse of our democratic civilization in social anarchy.

Love of freedom, confidence in cooperative effort, optimism, faith in the American way will live so long as our schools loyally devote themselves to truly liberal education. To assign the university the mission of ever strengthening the foundations of our culture is to ennoble the institution and confirm the vital importance of its service.

Historical failures in the application of democratic principles must be as earnestly studied as the most brilliant of democracy's triumphs. But underlying all must be the clear conviction that the principles themselves have timeless validity. Dependence by the country upon the schools for this vital service implies no infringement of academic freedom.

Indeed, academic freedom is nothing more than specific application of the freedoms inherent in the American way of life. It follows that to protect academic freedom, the teacher must support the sum total of the principles which, among other things, guarantees freedom for all. The teacher's obligation to seek and speak the truth is further safeguarded by university custom and commitment.

There will be no administrative suppression or distortion of any subject that merits a place in this University's curricula. The facts of communism, for instance, shall be taught here—its ideological development, its political methods, its economic effects, its probable course in the future. The truth about communism is, today, an indispensable requirement if the true values of our democratic system are to be properly assessed. Ignorance of communism, fascism, or any other police-state philosophy is far more dangerous than ignorance of the most virulent disease.

Who among us can doubt the choice of future Americans, as between statism and freedom, if the truth concerning each be constantly held before their eyes? But if we, as adults, attempt to hide from the young the facts in this world struggle, not only will we be making a futile attempt to establish an intellectual "iron curtain," but we will arouse the lively suspicion that statism possesses virtues whose persuasive effect we fear.

The truth is what we need—the full truth. Except for those few who may be using the doctrine of communism as a vehicle to personal power, the people who, in our country, accept communism's propaganda for truth are those most ignorant of its aims and practices. Enlightenment is not only a defender of our institutions, it is an aggressive force for the defeat of false ideologies.

America was born in rebellion, and rebellion against wrong and injustice is imbedded in the American temper. But whatever change our rebels of the American past may have sought, they were quick to proclaim it openly and fearlessly, preaching it from the house-tops. We need their sort, and here at Columbia we shall strive to develop them—informed, intelligent rebels against ignorance and imperfection and prejudice. But because they have sought the truth and know it, they will be loyal to the American way, to the democracy within which we live. They will never tire of seeking its advancement, however viciously they may be attacked by those content with the status quo. Their loyalty will be enhanced by each day they spend at Columbia.

The American university does not operate in an unreal world of its own, concerned solely with the abstract, secluded from the worrisome problems of workaday living, insulated against contact with those other institutions which constitute our national structure. Just as the preservation of the American way demands a working partnership among all 146 million Americans, its continued development demands a working partnership between universities and all other free institutions.

The school, for example, that enjoys a partnership with the manufacturing industries and labor unions and mercantile establishments of its community is a better and more productive school in consequence of its non-academic associations. Its influence permeates the entire community and is multiplied many times over while the school itself, energized by the challenges and dynamism of community life, grows and broadens with each problem it helps surmount.

Together, the university and the community—the entire record of human experience at their call, able to apply academic, technical and practical knowledge to the problem, joined in voluntary cooperative effort—together they can analyze and evaluate and plan. By such partnership, it is not too much to hope that the university—losing none of its own freedom, but rather extending its academic horizons—will in time help develop a new freedom for America—freedom from industrial strife.

Partnership is the proof and product of unity. But in a free democracy unity is possible only through intelligent and unswerving adherence to fundamental principles. Columbia shall teach them. More than that, Columbia shall demonstrate, in every way possible, their practical application.

To build a stouter unity among our people is the most worthy of goals. For a unified America is the greatest temporal power yet seen upon the earth—a power dedicated to the betterment and happiness of all mankind. Columbia shares in that dedication.

Columbia University, like so many others, has been established and is voluntarily maintained and supported by free people. In no other environment could it in the space of two centuries have attained an international stature as a home of learning and research.

Columbia University, consequently, an independent gift-supported institution, free from political and sectarian obligation, will forever be bound by its loyalty to truth and the basic concepts of democratic freedom. It shall follow, then, that Columbia will always be characterized by: First, an undergraduate body of men and women, schooled in the broad expanse of human knowledge and humble in their heritage—resolute that they shall pass both on with some increase. From among them will come scholars, executives, statesmen. But Columbia shall count it failure, whatever their success, if they are not all their lives a leaven of better citizenship.

Second, Columbia will be characterized by: a graduate body of men and women who, each in his own field, shall advance frontiers of knowledge and use the techniques of science in the service of humanity. From among them will come skilled surgeons, engineers, lawyers and administrators, great leaders in every profession and science. But again, we shall count it failure, if they, by specialization, become blinded to human values and so ignore their fundamental duty as citizens.

Third, Columbia University will be: a dynamic institution as a whole, dedicated to learning and research and to effective cooperation with all other free institutions which will aid in the preservation and strengthening of human dignity and happiness. Our way of life and our university are the flowering of centuries of effort and thought. Men of the ancient world—in Jerusalem and Athens and Rome; men of all epochs, all regions, and all faiths have contributed to the ideals and ideas that animate our thinking. Columbia University is, and shall continue, both heir of that past and a pioneer in its future increase.

PARIS CORRESPONDENT

Dear Ed and Fred,

Someone ought to tell Ike the facts of public life. Those eminent chowder-heads, Buck Lanham and Cabot Lodge, either don't know or are afraid. The latest story about Lanham around here is that he isn't really a yes-man for Ike. Any time Ike says no, Lanham says no too. And that's most of the time.

I fought myself out with Lanham and had one medium-sized bout with Ike himself about the NATO report. I pleaded with him to set a decent release time and predicted that his 0001 time would in any case be violated, as it was. I also tried to get him to do a radio recording separately from the TV spot, but Ike was stubborn as a Kansas mule. He hates both radio and TV and suffers from the delusion that he can virtually do without them. He has the strange complex about TV particularly, that it is purely a publicity medium for publicity-seekers, and it offends his sense of propriety to stand before a camera. I asked him what the difference was, publicity-seeking-wise, between a press conference without cameras and one with cameras and he couldn't honestly explain the moral principle involved. He just doesn't like it.

I am now engaged in a fight with Lanham about calling a news conference, with cameras, as soon as the announcement is official that Ike has requested relief from duty. Our association has made such a request and I'm again the pool man on it. That jerk Lanham says Ike's letter will speak for itself. He insists there will be no more appearances by Ike for us until the day he leaves at a big farewell press conference. And he refuses to discuss the possibility of Ike making any TV or radio addresses on some special trip home, for one of the three occasions mentioned in a previous report of mine. That's up to Ike, says Lanham, and just pushes the papers through to Ike's aide and you never hear about it again.

I think it would be a good idea for Ed to get in touch with Paul Hoffman about this. It is the only way I know to line up Ike futurely. And he is certainly going to need a radio-TV campaign manager, with some authority, or he'll make some bad enemies in our media. God help the man who takes the job. Ike will be very tough to handle, I think.

I'm sorry about the Notre Dame Easter spot. I pulled every possible string to get permission. Philippe Barrès, whose father was one of France's greatest Catholic writers, and the Count de Leusse, of the Quai d'Orsay, a socialite Catholic leader, both called the Archbishop of Paris himself to back up my request. Through them I got to talk to him about it, and he was extremely pleasant. Monseigneur Feltin, the Archbishop, told me the request came too late to be granted. That is, it came just before the beginning of Holy Week, with special services and conferences of the French bishops in Paris all week long. He told me that he would however grant us special permission to make a film inside Notre Dame, with him and the choir, the organ, the bells, processions, almost anything we liked, after Holy Week. I have an appointment with his film director, Father Pichard, next week to discuss this. I think we ought to make a Notre Dame film, perhaps the Easter Service and the Christmas Eve Service, that is, the highlights of each, for future use. I don't think we ought to use Feltin himself, however, for that could date the film should something happen to him.

I would also like to start working with McClure on a Paris tailpiece spot for SIN, a dateless feature piece that we could work on in between other assignments. I am working on a suggested script now which I'll send to you in a few days - a sort of working outline of the project.

Enclosed, you will find two letters to Buck Lanham in which I requested some material for a spot on Ike's resignation. Lanham has already told me it's very unlikely that he can put it through, but I'm going over his head and behind his back on it as discretely as possible, hoping to get something on it. I also have requests pending for exclusive statements (about 30 seconds each) from Foreign Minister Schuman and Defense Minister Pleven on what Ike's resignation means to France. Ditto a plan with Pierre Lazareff to film the extra edition of his paper France Soir (biggest in the country), that he intends to bring out when the news breaks. We can get a short shot of the paper coming off the presses, the front-page headline in French over Ike's picture, and a news-vendor running out of the building hawking the story on the boulevards.

Some one of these ideas ought to come through for us, I hope.

Meanwhile, best regards to you all from all of us.

David

Dear General Lanham,

We would like to make a suggestion to General Eisenhower which we believe would be of considerable public and historic interest.

The suggestion is that the General dictate his letter of resignation on a dictaphone machine, rather than to a shorthand typist.

In that way, we would have a permanent voice recording of this extremely important occasion. It could become, perhaps even to the General himself, a very precious souvenir.

For the American public, it would certainly be of the greatest human interest to hear the General's own voice dictating his letter.

The Columbia Broadcasting System would like to use such a recording in a special documentary report which we are preparing on the occasion of the Supreme Commander's resignation.

Naturally, we understand that any such material would be given to us only after the official announcement of General Eisenhower's request for relief has been made.

It is also understood that this request is in line with your official policy that exclusives may be given when the report requested originates with a correspondent and is unique, which, I believe is the case with this suggestion.

We urge you to give this matter your most serious consideration, and would appreciate your cooperation.

Sincerely yours,

April 8, 1952

Dear General Lanham,

C.B.S. is planning to do a special television report on the occasion of General Eisenhower's request for relief from duty as Supreme Commander, if and when the General does so decide.

There are certain personal and material elements that we need for this report and for which we would greatly appreciate your assistance.

We would like to have short statements, recorded on film at SHAPE, from the following personalities:

1) General Alfred M. Gruenther
2) Field Marshal Montgomery
3) General Juin
4) Admiral Caponi

As you see, we would like to get the international flavor in the comments. If any of these officers are not available, could the comment be forthcoming from some other high ranking American, French, British and Italian officer.

We also want very much to interview the person who actually has typed Eisenhower's request for resignation, such as, for example, Warrant Officer Good or Wave Helen Weaver.

We want also to interview you on the way the news broke over here, including such items of interest as transatlantic telephone calls, telegrams, etc. In that respect, do you or can you make recordings of transatlantic calls that are coming to you on this subject, which we could use for our own radio show which we are planning to do on the same topic.

On the material side, we need certain props for the television show:

1) the pen which Eisenhower uses to sign the letter.

2) an exact carbon copy of the letter itself.

3) the typewriter on which the letter was written. We would like to have Mr. Good or Miss Weaver re-enact the scene at the typewriter, filming over the typist's shoulder the letter as it is being typed.

We intend, of course, to stay within your restrictions on politics at SHAPE, limiting SHAPE's participation in the show strictly to the question of what it means to have the Supreme Commander leave.

We would greatly appreciate your cooperation in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

General Charles T. Lanham

Eisenhower, Mamie

November 14, 1952

Dear Mamie,

Sometime, somewhere, in your mass of mail you may come across this. I thought you might like to have the pictures taken in your mother's backyard before the long trek began. Since I didn't take the pictures I can say that one of the two of the President-elect is as good as any I have seen.

I have a couple of chunks of film from the television show; one I have titled "The Eisenhower Battle of Harlem", the other is a rather moving sequence we shot in Abilene election night and the morning after. It includes a fair number of the General's old friends and teachers--and quite a lot of "old friends" you have both acquired since last week. Be glad to bring or send the film up if you care to look at it some evening.

THE WHITE HOUSE

April 21, 1955

Dear Ed:

I wonder if it would be convenient for you to come to an informal stag dinner on the evening of Monday, May sixteenth. I hope to gather together a small group, and I should like very much for you to attend if it is possible for you to do so.

Because of the informality of the occasion, I suggest that we meet at the White House about half past seven, have a reasonably early dinner, and devote the evening to a general chat. While I am hopeful that you can attend, I realize that you already may have engagements which would interfere. If so, I assure you of my complete understanding.

I shall probably wear a black tie, but business suit will be entirely appropriate.

With warm regard,

Sincerely,

Dwight D. Eisenhower

My dear Ed:

You will no doubt recall a conversation you had with Jim Armsey, of Ford, and the paper you wrote for him. I have had discussions on the project under consideration and I am in a position to organize from the moneybag a campaign to seduce you to be uninhibited editor-in-chief of a great network.

Are you coming to New York? I want a hearing before you throw me out of your garden. Assuming the millions appear to be adequate and the commitment is firm for a substantial number of years, I want you to let me play with the project because you shouldn't and probably couldn't carry on the diplomacy even if you think the next five or ten years might be exciting if dwelt in this enterprise. I am so excited that I told my friends that if you would have me as an office boy part time, it's one of the few careers which would tempt me to retire from the Bar, of which I will have been a member for a half century in April, 1963.

Give me a ring. I may be in Washington on Telstar and other matters in the next fortnight and could arrange to see you on a Saturday.

BURN BEFORE READING

Burn Before Reading

My dear Ed:

You may recall ages ago that I indicated the illegality and cruelty of CBS, viz-a-viz, a lawyer on my staff in the Galindez matter.

I am advised today that CBS and not its insurance company paid a handsome sum of money running into thousands of dollars rather than run the risk of a trial for libel.

If my skin were not utterly thick, I should have sued in my behalf and retired on the proceeds. I still don't know what I could have retired into!!

I write you this note because there is an agreement between the parties that the resolution of the libelous article and the law suit derived therefrom should receive no publicity. I have no objection to such gentle tactics in our culture. I was not personally involved. But I do suggest that if we had a courageous and vigilant press, radio and tv, private parties would not be allowed to put to sleep the termination of a law suit which was propelled by an utterance on a mass media and which obtained some publicity at the time of the instigation of the litigation.

Tuck this all in the back of your all too over-busy mind.

For your eyes alone

March 6, 1959

My dear Harry:

I have not seen the famous quote of Time magazine in regard to Bolivia. You may recall our talk at lunch on this very subject but in relation to a difference in cultural attitudes toward reporting in other folkways of the East.

I write you at this time only to suggest that I trust that even if an error has been made in your gazette that it will not go chicken. I have been deeply involved in matters concerning South American countries. The communist advances have become unbelieveably great in the last two years. Couldn't some special Time correspondent for the United States do an objective job using the Bolivian incident as a springboard? How many copies of Time got into Bolivia, or were there any copies in the villages in which disturbances were created. I would hate to see your paper conclude, because of an error, if any, that it would have to lean backwards in exposing the communist infiltration.

I am not a regular reader of Time but I wonder if you have discerned the new strategy of the communists to avoid the stigma of "nationalization" by take-over of management without buying out the investors.

Recently, while talking with high officials of the CIA, I suggested that within five years Russia will have a beachhead in South America. The response I received was: why so optimistic; it will be less than five years.

If I can be of any help, let me know.

Cy? I do not feel free to send you letters from here to me — HST.

For your eyes alone

March 11, 1959

My dear Harry:

I read this week's story on Bolivia. It made me low in spirit because the press not only distorted the image of Time but deluded the American public with respect to the episode. Unless I am mistaken, not a single New York newspaper indicated that the copies were delivered or, if you please seized, by the Bolivian government and the diffusion of the story was obviously controlled by the government.

Far more serious news distortion is occurring every day in relation to the take-over in Cuba, for example, of the telephone company, television station, etc., without the use of the dirty word "nationalism". The communists who have infiltrated the Castro government have devised the most devilish trick in order to avoid the stigma of the word "nationalism". As you know, the present communist tactic, in South America particularly, is to instal an interventor to run a private business. Thus all of the effects of government take-over exist without the stigma which might attach to the concept of "nationalism". The investors are left impotent even as to a claim they might make in the event of condemnation by the government.

I have just re-examined, as I told Jack Jessup, the great strides made by Russia during the period of the last Berlin airlift episode. At that time advances were made in Czechoslovakia, China, Yugoslavia, Guatemala, etc. I will bet you a good lunch in Berlin that while Russia uses the Berlin crisis mood, on this occasion it hopes to divert our attention from the South American program under way in many countries for communist infiltration or take-over of governments. I am not misled by the distinction between Trotskyite and Stalinist forces but I am worried that as a result of the McCarthy era the people of our Republic seem reluctant to point fingers at communist advances to the South of us for fear of being called red baiters or McCarthyites.

I hope to hear from Jack after he had his braintrust examine the innumerable advances which I find made by Russia during the '47-'48

Berlin crisis which evaporated with a frightening graciousness after Russia had used the period from the Yangtze River, to the capture of Benes, to Guatamala.

Don't bother to acknowldge receipt. If you want anyone from your office to see me to get elaboration of my hunch, don't hesitate to do so.

Incidentally, I have alerted Fulbright and others to the need of reviewing the previous Berlin crisis historical evidence of communist advances.

Yours,

March 9, 1959

My dear Bill:

During all of my recent conversations with officials in government agencies in Washington and more particularly in the State Department, I find a kind of hypnosis in existence. Not a crevice of the government mind is open for contemplation of any problem other than Berlin.

This brought my mind back to the previous Berlin airlift crisis days. I write you now because I have a hunch that an examination of the great Soviet advances during the previous Berlin crisis may point to the possibility of a duplication of the pattern as a diversionary tactic on the part of Russia. If you have not already done so, might it not advantage you and our Republic to take a look at what happened in Mongolia, Guatamala, Czechoslovakia, Formosa, etc., during the period o f the airlift and the period just preceding it and just following it.

I have been in constant touch for some months, except during my journey to Pakistan, with the Castro situation. I will bet you a very good lunch in Berlin, although you should give me odds of a bottle of wine at least, that this Berlin crisis will evaporate as did the last one and that the shift from the May deadline set by Mr. K. will be proven to be due to the fact that the communists in Central and South America are slow in their consolidation of position so that the original date of April 7th for Caribbean and South American invasions had to be postponed for a short period. I don't know if either you or Mike Mansfield can take a look at the files of the CIA; that secret empire must of course be inefficient as are all human beings who report to no one but themselves. The crescendo of trouble to the South of us is certainly not fortuitous and we may find that the present strategy of Russia is successful in that it has led to what is left of our State Department to fall asleep as to South America just as we failed to realize that the previous Berlin airlift period resulted in substantial advances by the communists far removed from Berlin.

I hope you don't mind my dropping you this line as to a hunch that might warrant you in putting a member of your staff to the task of preparing for you the real story of the period during the previous Berlin crisis.

If by some chance I am right, I suggest that the matter is too important to be discussed before the American public in premature terms.

I don't like to bother you but I think this letter may save you some nuisances.

Edward S. Silver, District Attorney of Kings County, wanted to retain me with respect to a grievance he holds against CBS based on "A Real Case of Murder: The People vs. Peter Mancerl". I did not examine his claims from a strictly law point of view. I assume this is a show which you merely read from a script. I am quite persuaded that Mr. Silver is rightly offended and that his speech at the American Bar Association in August, 1961 may well concern Mr. Stanton and CBS should litigation ensue. I told Ed that professional and other more important devoted relations with you precluded me from entering into the case.

I write only to suggest that if you hear from your former Boss you can bear in mind that I maybe of some slight help to you personally in view of the fact that Ed Silver views me with good will.

Point No. 3 in the enclosed copy of letter which I wrote to Howard K. Smith may ring a bell and suggest some method by which the idea can be used for your purposes.

The great problem of the next century will be the colored problem. I suggest it is the destiny of our Republic to be the leader in the bridge between the uncolored and the colored. If England and other European nations lick the problem, they will still not be able to supply leadership because the number of colored people in those cultures is negligible. If we lick it as we are, good -- we can really lead because here millions of colored people reside.

My dear Ed:

Harry Ransom, Chancellor of the University of Texas, will be in New York sometime between now and March first. Will you be around town? I find Ransom the most exciting man I have met in years in educational circles and he indicates he would like to chat with you sometime.

Best,

Yours,

Dear Ed:

You stay in my mind. I am a loyal fool and it is not easy for me to cut out or cut down affections. Don't tell me you are not lonely — and I mean lonely in its real sense.

I don't want to press my way into your problems but this note I wanted to write to let you know that you should not avoid me because you think I may not understand what life is doing to you.

Best,

Yours,

My dear Ed:

You may recall ages ago that I indicated the illegality and cruelty of CBS, viz-a-viz, a lawyer on my staff in the Galindez matter.

I am advised today that CBS and not its insurance company paid a handsome sum of money running into thousands of dollars rather than run the risk of a trial for libel.

If my skin were not utterly thick, I should have sued in my behalf and retired on the proceeds. I still don't know what I could have retired into.

I write you this note because there is an agreement between the parties that the resolution of the libelous article and the law suit derived therefrom should receive no publicity. I have no objection to such gentle tactics in our culture. I was not personally involved. But I do suggest that if we had a courageous and vigilant press, radio and tv, private parties would not be allowed to put to sleep the termination of a law suit which was propelled by an utterance on a mass media and which obtained some publicity at the time of the instigation of the litigation.

Tuck this all in the back of your all too over-busy mind.

Yours,

Dear Morris:

First things first; I agree entirely with your letter on the miscalled debates.

On the other matter, I feel I've finally had you. It would have been quite impossible to suggest why it was unwise for the candidates to discuss Quemoy and Matsu without giving the listener the background on what has in fact happened and been said about those two miserable pieces of real estate. I am attaching a copy of the script and suspect that maybe for once you "listened too quick."

Impertinent out of affection. Last Sunday after making the great point about the danger of talking detailed strategy in the campaign, which may be of possible lethal significance, you then fell into the trap of discussing the problem on the merits; thus, in my judgment, losing the ability to persuade the public on your main point.

You might be amused at the letter I have written to the next President of the United States. Incidentally, I have some indications that I may be called upon as a possible intermediary in the plan.

My dear Mr. President or
Dear Jack and Dick:

I am disturbed for the sake of our Republic at the subtle but dangerous shift from political discussion into a format of a Quiz Show. I wonder if you could not agree on a joint statement that goes to all future questions of basic diplomacy with the arch enemy of our society -- Communist Colonialism.

When the Constitution of the United States was drafted in 1787 the second resolution adopted provided that all discussions shall be secret so that the delegates could more readily change their minds. In fact there would have been no constitution agreed upon if our 100 weekly gazettes had had access to the debates. As you know, Ben Franklin was accompanied by younger delegates to his tavern every night so as to make certain that he would not blab the day's proceedings.

Even between people in tender love there must be some areas of reserve; no spouse dares tell the other all of his or her thoughts. All the more reason why, with people we do not trust, it seems to me perilous to have the present game proceed so that the public will get some temporary pleasure in watching the matching of wits rather than permit our nation and the next president to use uncommitted and undisclosed moves of diplomacy. Whether we give up certain islands or not is remote from the issue I am writing to you about. My concern is that the matter should not be discussed in terms of strategy in a public debate. Neither of you would ask for a plebiscite on such a matter, which may involve a strategy always subjected to other considerations raised by history at the moment when a decision is called for.

I must be frank in saying that the questions from the reporters at your debates are bound to disturb the next president. None of the questions go to philosophy of government or the destiny of our Republic. In the main they are the usual dirty quiz or panel questions, not to get truth but to catch one or the other of you in an inconsistency.

I understand the pressure that made both of you submit to this inadequate exhibition. Might you not now issue a joint formal statement that makes clear that there are areas which should not be divulged or exposed in advance to the general public, much less to our opponents, and at most should be addressed to allies who can be trusted? I am fearful that that the American public is engaged in a game to discover who can best needle the other, who is best at repartee and who has many arts -- none of which necessarily go to the question of stature for the Chief Magistrate of our nation.

With non-partisan good will I address this letter. Our Republic is in dire trouble. If I can help in the direction of such a joint declaration of statesmanship do not hesitate to call on me.

THE OVERVIEW

Everyone knows that a great gulf divides the rich and poor countries of the world. But few are aware that this gulf will inevitably widen for at least the rest of the 20th Century. Fewer still have realized the full implications of this grim fact of growing inequality. Yet future world politics and America's position in the world will hinge on the directions the underdeveloped countries, goaded by economic inferiority, take in the next 40 years.

The widening income gap is inevitable because of the already existing disparities among rich and poor nations, and will persist even though the poor nations grow at record speed. A giant walking at a leisurely pace will cover more ground than a midget running at top speed. Likewise, the economic gains of even a slowly growing economic giant will be greater than those of a rapidly expanding, but currently meager economy.

It follows from the very size of the gap to be bridged that income will have to grow so rapidly that the so-called "population explosion" will become of relatively minor importance. However, a worldwide "economic explosion", as it solves the problems of overpopulation and poverty, may seriously drain the earth's natural resources, creating the need for still another "explosion" in science and technology.

More important, as the economic aspirations of the underdeveloped countries rise, the increasing income gap will be increasingly resented. Their psychological reaction can briefly be described as "inferiority complex" with symptoms of extreme nationalism and over-compensation. Satisfied with nothing less than full parity with the more advanced countries, they will seek the authoritarian forms of government best suited for a forced and speedy march out of poverty. Extreme national pride will generally preclude subservience to world Communism, although friendly relations with Russia may not be uncommon. On the other hand, the United States and its Western allies are in for a long spell of hostility and abuse, and relations between them and the less advanced countries will be strained for many years to come.

For the American people, this state of affairs may be disheartening, as the underdeveloped countries turn to unfriendly, undemocratic ways. Therefore, we must trim our expectations and count our actions as successes or failures according to the more limited criteria of staving off Communism and aiding economic development. More specifically, this means a willingness on our part to continue economic aid almost for its own sake, and an aware appreciation and tolerance of the extreme nationalistic temper of the newly emerging nations. Eventually, patience will have its reward; but a lack of it will, even in the short run, carry the penalties of spreading Communism and threatening world peace.

VI The Year 2000 and Beyond

The Inexorable Income Gap

Everyone knows that while the U. S. and some of its western allies now enjoy unprecedentedly high standards of living, much of the world's population is living in conditions of relative poverty. The reasons for this harsh contrast in ways of life are widely understood--it stems primarily from the West's accumulations of knowledge and the mechanical tools to apply it. It is felt, therefore, that economic well-being is possible for all people, and that in the fairly immediate future many currently underdeveloped countries will embark upon programs of rapid economic growth. Since the contrast in living standards of rich and poor countries is a major source of world tensions, this expected assault on poverty is viewed most hopefully and many responsible persons advocate that the western nations massively assist in this effort so that inequality among men may soon wane.

Unhappily, however, even if this economic growth proceeds with the greatest possible rapidity, the gap between the rich and poor nations will inevitably widen, and it may be generations before it even begins to narrow. It certainly will not occur in this century. By the year 2000, the gap will be wider than ever. For example, if the U. S. continues along its present growth path and India goes twice as fast, India will still not begin to catch up until the year 2035, at which time the difference between our incomes and theirs will be 5 times what it is now.

This conclusion rests upon relatively slender assumptions. It assumes only that standards of living in the West will go on improving as they have in the past century. It also assumes that the underdeveloped countries will not expand at rates greatly in excess of those historically achieved by such countries as Russia and Japan. The presumed percentage rates of growth for the underdeveloped countries are much higher than for the U. S. Nevertheless, the gap will widen. Thus if the U. S. - India gap is even to begin to narrow by the year 2000, the Indian economy will have to grow at a rate unprecedented in world history.

Why the gap must widen for a long time to come can be simply illustrated as follows: a one percent increase in the income of a millionaire is equivalent to a doubling of income of a $10,000-a-year man. The U. S. is so far ahead of the backward countries that even a leisurly rate of growth adds more to its income than the fastest rate of growth can add to that of the backward countries.

The Politics of Frustration

In recent years the long existant gap between rich and poor countries has, thanks to the spread of western ideas, become a major source of world tension. The underdeveloped countries, with a rising level of aspirations, feel increasingly frustrated. Their complex emotional reaction to the disparity between aspiration and achievement leads to rage, self-hatred, envy, xenophobia, rationalization, and over-compensation. Broadly speaking, two patterns of behavior emerge: hostility to the more successful, imitation of the more successful.

Envy and rationalization lead to antagonism toward advanced "imperialistic" nations. Thus nationalistic politicians, whether in power or out, have a natural advantage in underdeveloped countries.

But a polity built on xenophobia alone cannot win lasting success. National pride demands that the country build up its industry in addition to thumbing its nose at the US. Thus regimes which do not show economic achievement are eventually cast off. Soon or late, the nation finds leaders ready to command a forced march into the modern world.

So great is the gap between rich and poor nations that the poor cannot be satisfied with modest rates of growth. But the extremely rapid rates demanded are hardly possible to a democratic system, since they require deprivation and social dislocation on a large scale. Consequently, an authoritarian regime is resorted to. Such a regime gains power and keeps it on the basis of its appeal to strong nationalist sentiments. The psychological dynamic behind the development program also comes from this national pride. But given the greatest enthusiasm, a forced march has little chance of success without the severest discipline.

As the gap grows between rich and poor nations, a parallel gap may well develop within the poor countries as the ruling elites there try to keep up with the more rapidly advancing standards in the west. The better educated elites have more westernized tastes; they also have or conspire to gain the power to satisfy these tastes. But as inequality grows within the nation, it becomes more difficult to demand sacrifice from the masses and increased repression becomes necessary. Moreover, imports of foreign luxury goods weaken foreign exchange reserves and reduce the amount of resources the country can put in economic growth. Therefore, not to cripple economic development it may be necessary either to have a "circulation of elites" by successive revolutions, or to suppress the elite as Stalin did. In either event extreme political tension may be the expected norm.

The Odds Against Communism

The threat of Communism in underdeveloped countries is easily exaggerated. Nationalist movements are commonly innocent of left-right ideologies and often mix the two in strange amalgams. Their mood is pragmatic because their needs are pressing and practical.

Anti-western feeling is naturally accompanied by a specious sort of pro-Soviet emotion arising out of the cold war situation. But this does not necessarily mean any leaning toward communism. At the very moment Soviet dignitaries are being greeted with flowers, local communist agitators may be languishing in dungeons.

Nationalist leaders follow this policy because, while the communists can give them significant help in the international sphere, they are not much help in domestic politics. Even if a politican is desirous of the support of a local communist party, he need only appear friendly to Russia to get it. But to hand his country over to communism implies a willingness to subordinate himself and his nations pride to Russian dictatorship -- not a very likely transaction.

In general, the weakness of communist movements in underdeveloped countries stems from their relatively limited appeal. For significant elements of the population--small businessmen, civil servants, army officers--the communists are simply not attractive. Communistic nationalistic leaders gain but an uninfluential following, while pure nationalist leaders are able to rally all elements of the population to their support.

Because communism is not palatable to the poor countries does not mean that free enterprise is. True, to many the Russian method of rapid economic growth is appealing. But there is no attraction in being a satellite. Nor is there attraction in the rigidities of Marxist dogma. The underdeveloped nations, then, are likely to choose those elements of the Soviet system that they find most useful while rejecting the system as such.

Population and Income: Tortoise and Hare?

The population is of great significance only where the economy is not growing much more rapidly than the population. But the obvious natural limits to population growth prevent it from outrunning a quickly expanding economy. Suppose, for example, that population and income are growing at 3% a year. If population growth were then cut in half (to roughly the US rate) living standards would only increase by only one-and-a-half percent per year, a modest rate. Compare this to the possible gains that can be achieved by boosting economic growth rates to 6, 7, or even 8 per cent. Clearly, the road out of poverty is traversed by economic measures rather than demographic.

When a nation's industry is growing rapidly, the demand for workers is very great. Recruiting for factories can become a major problem. If too many farmers are brought to the city there is a danger of reducing agricultural production. Nor can farmers be readily replaced by machinery in a country whose economic growth is limited primarily by the amount of machinery it can lay its hands on. The problem is greatly simplified if the population is growing rapidly. For then there are plenty of young workers who can be drawn into the city without disrupting agricultural production. These are always the most mobile and easily trained elements in the labor force. If they are present in sufficient numbers, then a serious slowup in production may be averted.

Of course, a rising population creates a food problem. But agricultural methods in underdeveloped countries are generally so primitive that concerted attention to this problem can lead to astounding increases in food production in a relatively short space of time. Improved seeds, pest control, fertilizers, can achieve this with little cost. They require no difficult reorganization of agriculture and present no special problems in education. Their introduction requires primarily the support of the farming population for the government.

In the short run, there are apparent advantages from lowering the birth rate since it tends to reduce the number of unproductive persons in the economy, who must be supported by the working population. Thus the average level of living is adversely affected. But in the long run, when unborn babies could be supplying a vital labor force need, it may well be a disadvantage. Cutting the birth rate in half means that in about fifteen years the number of new workers entering the economy will be halved. After two decades of rapid economic growth this could be an unwonted bottleneck barring further growth.

HOW TO LOSE FRIENDS AND INFLUENCE HISTORY

America is facing a long period when, do what it will, it will only face hostility from the nations of the world who are behind it in the economic race. This hostility is unjustifiable since--whatever our sins--we did not create poverty. Nevertheless, it is something we must come to expect and even to tolerate. We must even be prepared to recognize its constructive aspects: the power of hate to unify whole peoples and give them great purpose and drive. And above all, we must recognize that there is no way that we can fundamentally alter the political and economic conditions giving rise to this situation.

But this is no counsel to despair or inaction. The common cold, which is incurable and unavoidable, causes much distress and discomfort; but its inevitability in no way means that we should ignore possible sources of relief or fail to guard against the threat of pneumonia. Similarly, the US in the next generation or two will have to find ways of preventing friction in its international relations from leading to war, the spread of communism, or the complete isolation of this country.

Much of this is a matter of tactics, but there is also a question of aims. The desire to be well-liked, not an especially noble motive, is vain in any case and should be supplanted by more substantive goals. Of these, three particularly recommend themselves. First, we must try to prevent the sphere of communist power from spreading. Second, we should endeavor to speed up and ease the process of economic growth in less developed countries for the sake of world peace and prosperity as well as to remove the prime conditions for communism's spread. Third, we should try to promote in as great a degree as possible the democratic liberties of people everywhere, taking care neither to impose rigid standards nor to relax in a double standard. Tactically, we should remember that a soft word turneth away wrath and that Rome wasn't built in a day.

American foreign policy is conducted in part by the State Department and in part by the American people. Whatever the formalities of treaties and diplomatic exchange, it is the attitudes of the people that sets the tone of the policy. A calm, patient and tolerant public that understands the long term aims of our foreign policy and does not, like a Newtonian body, react to every emotion with an equal and opposite emotion, will give our international relations a spirit that will do much to temper the inevitable hostilities and avoid the dangers of war and the isolation of America in a sea of communist power.

The Year 2000 and Beyond

In the year 2000 things will have a different feel about them. Conceive, if you will, a world in which billions of people, despite differences in their incomes, live at standards experienced heretofore only in the US. This would be a world consuming perhaps ten times its current output of meat, fifteen times its current output of electric power, twenty times its currect output of copper. How long would our minerals last being gorged at such a rate?

The answer is obvious. Its implication is that by the year 2000 man will have to find totally new ways of making things. In order for such a vast world economy to exist for even a day there would have to be virtually inexhaustible supplies of energy. We will have to make all materials synthetically when the reserves of iron, copper, wood, coal, aluminum, etc., run out. Thus material abundance demands a new era of scientific achievement.

Abundance will exhaust the world's material resources. But it can liberate man's great spiritual resources--if he so chooses. In today's society of scarcity, conspicuous consumption is the means of achieving social recognition. But as abundance grows, eventually materialistic emulation becomes pointless. To gain the good opinion of our fellows, something else is needed. This may well be personal excellence. The field of "competition" becomes quality of person rather than quantity of possession. Artistic creation, intellectual accomplishment, the art of love--these become the new badges of status.

Culture presumes leisure, which comes only with abundance. Not everyone will enter the groves of abundance at once. We in the US will enter, are entering, first. As other nations follow in our path they adopt many of the ways we have pioneered. Culturally we can see this today in an England vying for America's standard of living. Its culture is becoming Americanized. From this side of the water it is not a pleasant sight to watch.

We are thus reminded of our great responsibility in the days to come. We will first explore the groves of abundance and others will follow the trails we blaze. For good or ill, the choices we make in the coming years will profoundly influence how millions yet unborn will bend their minds and utilize their leisure.

The foregoing outline presents a body of hypotheses which, while derived from empirical observations, need more rigorous and scholarly testing. A few avenues of indicated research are:

1. Forecasting of world income by countries and regions. Extension of existing population projections.

2. Computation and analysis of the capital, foreign aid, labor force, and production growth requirements of underdeveloped areas for the income gap to begin to narrow by the year 2000.

3. Detailed examination and comparative analysis of recent political and economic history of underdeveloped countries to test hypotheses of psychological and political forces operative in them.

4. Research into the present, likely future, and necessary future state of science, technology and resources.

5. Examination of the early history of Japan, Russia and Germany to determine the degree of similarity with presently underdeveloped countries re nationalist psychology and levels of preindustrial wealth.

Dear Mr. Schwartz:

Thank you for your kind letter of December 15th inviting Mr. Murrow to attend the Twelfth Night Party on January 6th in honor of Morris Ernst.

As you may know, Mr. Murrow is on a year's leave of absence and since he will be traveling abroad for the next six months, it unfortunately will not be possible for him to attend. Thank you again for your note.

Very sincerely yours,

My dear Ed:

The Bar Association must be getting soft. It has finally decided to honor its lifetime enfant terrible. As you can see from the enclosed, the honor may be somewhat questionable but it certainly will be fun.

Since this will be a big party for Morris, I have arranged with the Bar Association that a block of seats be set aside for close friends. If you are able to come please fill in the enclosed coupon and return it with your check directly to the Bar Association. They have your name and will be sure to take care of you when they receive your order. Of course both ladies and gentlemen are invited.

Morris is presently in Europe and does not know about these special invitations. I think he will enjoy this surprise and I know he will be warmed by your presence.

I certainly hope you can come.

Sincerely yours,

My dear Ed:

We don't arrive until the 20th of this month and you may have left before then. You may recall that sometime ago I suggested that I would like to raise, in dollar bills from the American people, sufficient funds to erect a statue to Winston Churchill in Grosvenor Square to face F. D. R. I got turned down by Brendan Bracken years ago and Brendan told me that it would not be fitting to have a statue erected during a man's life time.

I made another pitch after that horror of an oil painting was made of Sir Winston for the Commons. Only recently I wrote again since the shift in the mores as evidenced by the statue erected at Woodford. I received a letter from Sir Winston's secretary, of which I am enclosing a copy.

Can you do me a favor? If this letter reaches you before you leave London, make a pitch with the secretary, whom you no doubt know. If you have left London, do whatever you can.

I imagine that the letter of November 6th, of which I enclose a copy arises from an ineptness on my part. I did not want any initiative on the part of Sir Winston. I merely wanted to be sure that he would not slap me down if I got the project under way.

One other point must be covered while I am in London, namely: some kind of a green light from the Park Board which controls the erection of statuary on Grosvenor Square. Please do what you can and get some kind of a message to me at the Hotel Berkeley, where I arrive on the night of the 20th.

Let me know where you can be reached. I will be in Zurich at the Baur au Lac on the 25th of this month for a few days and then back to London. I may have to go down to see some clients near Nice. I will bring over some memos which I have prepared for various officials in Washington pointing to various courses which we might pursue with respect to the television mess.

My Dear Ed:

Margaret and I will arrive at the Berkeley on November 20th. I do hope we can have some time before the 25th when I must go to Zurich on what is called law business.

Best to Janet.

My dear Ed:

Tried to reach you and understand you are in California. If you are on the confidential matter which we discussed at the Voisin, remember my deep interest in it.

If you aren't out on that project, you might recall that you and Janet should come to Nantucket for a few days, where we can solve the world. If you want me to hold your little fortress for you on any level while you are away, don't hesitate to call.

Yours,

Dear Ed:

There is a lot of talk and testimony about equal time on the air. Does Everybody refuse to know about the Farmers Union case argued in the Supreme Court months ago -- no decision yet -- which may give the answer. If equal time is compulsory to a station, what do we do about censorship and libel? The enclosed brief goes to the essential point. We have much more material. Call up Alan Schwartz if you want to see the brief filed by the Radio station, etc.

Please return the enclosed as they are our only office copies.

Yours,

Morris L. E.

Since there is a conspiracy in favor of silence as to libel matters, I thought you might be interested to learn from me that the court has held in the suit of Richter vs. CBS that the statement uttered by CBS was libelous per se. I no longer hope that over networks the truth catches up with error.

Dear Morris:

Sometime, somehow, I will write out the pieces you request in your letter of March 24, but right now I simply cannot do it. There aren't enough hours in the day or enough days in the week. Believe me, I am trying to hang on till the first of July, and between now and then it just cannot be done. Sorry.

As ever yours,

I do not think I have ever asked a favor. I would appreciate it greatly if you would write out in some detail the two stories you told me about your two important teachers - the crippled teacher of English and the page of Marcus Aurelius, and the teacher of Surveying - while you remember them; what they did for you; did you ever thank them; number in classroom;- you know, the works.

My dear Ed:

By any chance are you free on April 7th. Father Gardiner and Bernard Berelson of Columbia, and I will lunch at the Lotus Club at one o'clock. The Ford Foundation referred us to Prof. Berelson who is their choice for an exploration along the lines we discussed at my home at various dinner parties. I hate to bother you and would not do so if I did not think that your presence would provide a real contribution to get my little project off the ground.

And as you know, you are always free to nuisance me.

My dear Ed:

In all the comments on equal time on radio and television, I have seen no word mentioning the fact that next Monday a case will be argued in the United States Supreme Court.

I am sending you a copy of our brief in behalf of the Farmers Union which was libeled by one of the candidates running for Congress. The important issue goes beyond equal time, for if there be a compulsion for equal time, it is now urged that the stations be immunized in libel suits.

Howard Smith may want to be alerted.

I am off to Washington. Call Eddie Greenbaum if you want more information and he will tell you about the brief filed by NAB and by our opponents in court next Monday.

Did you see that Mike hit the front page in the New York Times with his new publishing house? I think it is the first time that that dirty word "book" has been on the front page in the Times, which in itself might have been worthy of comment on radio.

Best,

Yours,

Statutes and Constitutional Provision Involved 2

Questions Presented 3

Statement of the Case 4

Summary of Argument 10

Argument:

Point I—Section 315 of the Federal Communications Act does not compel radio and television stations to broadcast defamation 13

(a) Deletion of libel is not "censorship" 14

(b) The licensee's duty to operate in the public interest cannot be avoided by claiming deletion of objectionable matter is "censorship" 19

(c) The Commission does not exercise the "power of censorship" in violation of Section 326 of the Federal Communications Act when it refuses to license a station which has a record of defamation 23

Point II—Section 315 of Federal Communications Act gives no immunity to a licensee for broadcasting a candidate's defamatory statements 26

PAGE

(a) Congress has consistently refused to grant immunity 27

(b) The respondent is not immunized against the petitioner's libel claim by any Congressional "preemption" of the field of broadcasting 30

(c) In enacting Section 315 Congress did not abrogate state law, but left to the states the determination of the broadcaster's liability for defamation 36

POINT III—The holding below, particularly in its effect upon persons who are not candidates, subverts the purpose of Section 315 and the policy of the Federal Communications Act..... 39

POINT IV—As construed below and applied to Petitioner, Section 315 violates the Fifth Amendment 46

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1958

No. 248

FARMERS EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA, NORTH DAKOTA DIVISION, a Corporation, Petitioner,

v.

WDAY, INC., a Corporation.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of North Dakota

BRIEF FOR PETITIONER

Opinion Below

The District Court handed down no opinion. The opinion of the Supreme Court of North Dakota handed down April 3, 1958 (R 30) is reported at 89 N. W. (2) 102, but has not yet been officially reported.

Jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C. 1257 (3) in that the cause involves an assertion of immunity under a statute of the United States (Section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934, c. 652, 48 Stat. 1088, as amended, c. 229, 66 Stat. 717, 47 U. S. C. 315) and in that the cause involves the validity of the statute, as construed below, under the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Judgment on remittitur was entered May 8, 1958 (R 51).

The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on August 2, 1958, after entry of an order of June 12, 1958, by Mr. Justice Whittaker granting an extension of time (R 53).

The petition was granted by order of this Court on October 13, 1958 (R 53), reported at 3 L. ed. (2) 54.

Statutes and Constitutional Provision Involved

(1) Section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934, c. 652, 48 Stat. 1088, as amended, c. 879, 66 Stat. 717, 47 U. S. C. 315:

> "(a) If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station: Provided, That such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this section. No obligation is imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate.
> "(b) The charges made for the use of any broadcasting station for any of the purposes set forth in this section shall not exceed the charges made for comparable use of such station for other purposes.
> "(c) The Commission shall prescribe appropriate rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this section."*

(2) Section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934, c. 652, 48 Stat. 1091, as amended, c. 645, 62 Stat. 862, 47 U. S. C. 326:

> "Nothing in this chapter shall be understood or construed to give the Commission the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication."

(3) Section 414 of the Communications Act of 1934, c. 652, 48 Stat. 1099, 47 U. S. C. 414:

> "Nothing in this chapter contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this chapter are in addition to such remedies."

(4) The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

> "No person shall * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law * * *"

Questions Presented

The questions presented are:

1. Whether Section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934 required the respondent, licensee of a radio and television station, to broadcast admittedly libelous statements made by a candidate for public office;

2. If so, whether Section 315 relieves the respondent from liability for broadcasting such libelous statements;

3. If so, whether such immunity from liability extends to admittedly libelous statements defaming a third party not a competing candidate for office;

4. Whether, in enacting Section 315, Congress intended to abrogate state law as to the liability of a radio and television station for broadcasting such defamatory matter;

5. Whether Section 315, as applied, deprives petitioner of liberty and property, including its reputation, without due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Statement of the Case

On October 29, 1956 respondent, WDAY, Inc., a North Dakota corporation engaged in broadcasting radio and television programs under a license issued by the Federal Communications Commission (R 16) broadcast a televised speech by one A. C. Townley, which contained inter alia the following statements about petitioner:

> "To: North Dakota Republicans, Farmers, Bankers and Businessmen
> "The Farmers Union program fully carried out as planned not as it is planned by the farmer members, but as it is planned by the Farmers Union Dictators, would establish a Communist Farmers Union Soviet right here in North Dakota.
> "This Farmers Union is now rapidly developing on your main street right here under your nose. This Farmers Union has already taken over vast business enterprise and threatens every businessman in North Dakota.
> "For ten years, Senator Young has used the power and prestige of the high office that he holds to serve this Farmers Union. He has not raised his voice or hand to stay the communist viper gnawing at your private ownership and liberty. On the contrary, Young says everything and does everything the Farmers union tell him to do or say—Democrat Alex Lind, Democrat Glenn Talbott, and Democrat Bill Thatcher —tell him what to say and how to vote on every matter that concerns the Farmers Union.

"In a letter to the voters dated October 10, 1956, Milton Young says, 'The Congressional Record will show that I have led the fight for 90% parity and I have letters from M. W. Thatcher thanking me.'

"Milton Young has no letter from President Eisenhower thanking him for supporting the Republican farm program because the bogus Republican, Milton Young, supports bogus Democrat farm program and gets his orders from the Democrat Farmers Union. Young is Republican in name only. His works are Communist, Democrat, Farmers Union works.

"Young and Burdick both support the Democrat Farmer program. Both men take orders from Communist controlled Democrat Farmers Union and now this amazing fact—Communist infiltration and power has gone so far in North Dakota that the Democratic Party supports 100% the Democratic Farmers Union candidate and the Republican Party supports 90% the Democratic Farmers Union candidate. The communists can't lose unless the Americans wake up and wake up fast.

"Mr. Republican farmer, Republican banker, Republican businessman, do you vote and work Republican with Eisenhower for the Republican farm program and against the Farmers Union soviet or do you now still walk hand in hand with communist Farmers Union dictators—communist Democrat Glenn Talbott, Democrat Bill Thatcher and their willing servant, Milton Young, to build this deadly tyranny.

"If you do, then the jig is up and the communist Farmer Union soviet is here for sure. I will talk over KFYR at 7:30 and KFGO at 8:30 every night this week. Also, Monday night before you vote. Please get your friends to listen." (R 18, 19)

These statements were recorded, and the speaker's image was photographed by agents and employees of the respondent, prior to the publication of the televised speech over the air waves (R 17, 18). The speech was televised over Channel No. 6, from Fargo, North Dakota, to thousands of listeners and viewers in North Dakota, South Dakota and Minnesota (R 3).

It is conceded that the quoted statements so broadcast by respondent referred to petitioner, and that these statements were defamatory per se (R 36).

Before October 29, 1956 Townley had submitted to respondent a script containing the libelous statements above referred to. Respondent advised Townley that the script contained statements which it believed to be false and libelous. Respondent further advised Townley that it would broadcast the script only if Townley so demanded under the mandate of Section 315 of the Communications Act. After Townley made such a demand, respondent then made its facilities available to Townley and proceeded to photograph, publish, reproduce and film the speech, including the defamatory statements concerning petitioner (R 17).

At the time of the telecast of October 29, 1956, Townley was a legally qualified candidate for the United States Senate (R 16). There were also two other legally qualified candidates for that office, Milton R. Young and Quentin N. Burdick (R 16, 17). Prior to October 29, 1956, respondent had telecast speeches of Young and Burdick, and had participated in the mechanical preparation of those speeches (R 17). Neither Young nor Burdick, in their respective speeches telecast by respondent had referred to Townley or to petitioner (R 17).

Petitioner, on January 14, 1957, filed a complaint in the District Court of Cass County, North Dakota, against respondent and Townley, claiming general, special and exemplary damages on account of the preparation, publication and telecast of the libel in the amount of $150,000 (R 1). Both defendants were served (R 7, 33) and both answered (R 8, 33).

Respondent's answer asserted two defenses to both of which petitioner demurred (R 11).

Respondent's first defense asserted that Section 14-0209 of the 1953 Supplement to the North Dakota Revised Code of 1943, which purported to immunize the licensee of a broadcasting station from liability for "any defamatory statement published or uttered in or as part of a visual or sound radio broadcast by anyone other than [the] owner, licensee or operator or agent or employee thereof," absolved it from liability for its part in preparing, publishing and televising Townley's speech (R 8). The District Court of Cass County sustained petitioner's demurrer to this defense, on the ground that the North Dakota immunity statute was unconstitutional under both the United States and the North Dakota Constitutions, and also on the ground that Congress had occupied the field and had not legislated immunity[1] (R 20, 22). This ruling was not appealed to the North Dakota Supreme Court (R 35).

Respondent's second defense asserted that the speech was broadcast under the mandate of Section 315, as interpreted by the Federal Communications Commission, that Section 315 as so interpreted in Matter of WDSU Broadcasting Company, 7 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 769 (1951), required respondent to broadcast Townley's speech, and that respondent was implicitly absolved of liability to petitioner (R 9-11). Petitioner demurred to respondent's second defense on the grounds that Section 315 was in-

[1] In the Conclusions of Law of the District Court, the North Dakota statute was held unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment and under three provisions of the State Constitution: that "every man may freely write, speak and publish his opinions on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of this privilege" (§9); that "every man for any injury done him in his lands, goods, person or reputation shall have remedy by due process of law (§22); and that all laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation (§11), the District Court finding being that this statute "unreasonably favors radio and television stations, over other forms of communication media." (Conclusions of Law on Demurrer to First Defense (R. 21, 22).)

applicable, that if applicable it did not grant respondent immunity from actions for defamation, and that if construed as granting immunity it would be unconstitutional as depriving the petitioner of its liberty and property and a substantive right to protect its property, including its reputation, without due process of law (R 13, 14). Petitioner's demurrer to this defense was overruled by the District Court, whose conclusions of law stated that the publication was privileged, that Section 315 granted respondent immunity and that Section 315, as so construed, was constitutional (R 22, 23).

No opinion was written by the District Court.

Neither petitioner nor respondent elected to plead further (R 24). Respondent moved for judgment in its favor for dismissal of the action (R 24). The motion was granted, and the District Court made Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law (R 15, 24) and ordered judgment for the respondent (R 24).

Petitioner appealed from this judgment to the Supreme Court of North Dakota (R 26). Its Assignments and Specifications of Errors, in addition to including general Assignments to the effect that the District Court had erred in overruling the demurrer and that the Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, Order for Judgment and Judgment were all contrary to law (R 27, 28), specifically urged that the District Court had erred in failing to find: that Section 315 was inapplicable to this case (R 28); that Section 315 did not grant immunity to the respondent (R 28); that if it did grant such immunity, Section 315 was unconstitutional in depriving petitioner of its liberty and property and a substantive right to protect its property, including its reputation, without due process of law (R 28); that Section 315 did not compel or authorize the respondent to broadcast the defamatory speech in question (R 29), and did not protect or shield the respondent from liability to petitioner (R 29).

The Supreme Court of North Dakota, in a 4-1 decision (R 30) affirmed the decision of the District Court with respect to respondent's second defense. Noting that the Townley speech was conceded to be libelous per se, the Court relied on the opinion of the Federal Communications Commission in Matter of Port Huron Broadcasting Co., 4 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 1 (1948), to the effect that the prohibition against censorship in Section 315 was "absolute" (R 36, 37) although the Court also quoted, with apparent approval, the statement in that opinion that the prohibition did not extend to speech in violation of the Communications Act or other federal law (R 37). Following the opinion of the Federal Communications Commission, the Court found that the prohibition of Section 315 precluded deletion of libel by respondent. The Court held that Congress had "taken full control of interstate radio and television communication" (R 39) and that Section 315 extended to respondent a privilege to broadcast the defamatory statements (R 39, 41). The result, the Court concluded, is to confer immunity on respondent, on the ground that it was not the intent of Congress to compel a station to broadcast libel and at the same time subject it to the risk of defending actions for damages (R 41). The Court also held that this result did not violate the Fifth Amendment, in view, it said, of the importance of dissemination of information as to the character and qualifications of candidates for public office (R 42, 43).

The minority opinion (R 43) asserted that the prohibition against "censorship" in Section 315 could not be taken as absolute, as witness the recognized exceptions of obscenity and blasphemy (R 44); that whatever the rule as to defamation of opposing candidates, who may be deemed to submit to a limited privilege of comment as to their fitness for office, Congress could never have intended to forbid deletion by licensees of remarks defamatory of a non-candidate or to deny to such a person recourse against the broadcasting station disseminating the libel (R 46, 47).

The order of affirmance of the State Supreme Court directed that the case be "remanded to the District Court for further proceedings according to law" (R 47, 48).

On remand the District Court on May 8, 1958 entered judgment in favor of respondent, taxing costs against the petitioner (R 49).

Summary of Argument

The Court below has held that petitioner has no cause of action for libel against respondent for broadcasting concededly libelous statements about petitioner over a multi-state area. This result was said to derive from the fact that the utterer of the libelous remarks was a political candidate, it being the Court's opinion that Section 315 of the Federal Communications Act relieves licensees from all liability for defamation spoken by political candidates including defamation of third persons like petitioner who are not candidates.

I

Petitioner maintains that the Court below incorrectly construed Section 315. The section does not compel radio and television stations to broadcast libel. It provides "equal opportunities" for political candidates and denies to stations the "power of censorship" over such candidates' speeches. The Supreme Court of North Dakota held that this no "censorship" provision means that the stations may not delete libel—in other words that it is a license to stations to defame not only political candidates but also third persons.

It is our contention that this holding does violence to the "equal opportunities" purpose of the section and that in no event can deletion of libel be considered "censorship" within the meaning of the section. Defamation is not within the constitutionally protected area of freedom of expression; hence it is no more "censorship" for a station to delete libel from the speech of a political candidate than it is censorship for the Federal Communications Commission to consider a station's record with respect to defamation in connection with the granting or renewal of that station's license.

The Court below rested its decision that no "censorship" means no deletion for libel on recent rulings of the Federal Communications Commission to that effect.

However, the no "censorship" proviso of Section 315 does not justify a licensee's failure to fulfill its obligation to operate in the public interest. Licensees may not broadcast obscenity, profanity, speech advocating forcible overthrow of the government, disaffection in the armed forces, and the like. Nor may they permit political candidates to violate the criminal laws of the states which forbid threats of violence, incitements to mob action, or comparable offenses. Libelous speech falls into the same category. Libel like obscenity, profanity, and other types of unlawful speech, inflicts injury by its very utterance and since it is not within the area of constitutionally protected speech, it is not "censorship" when a licensee deletes it.

II

The holding below that respondent is immune from liability for libel under state law, conflicts with the intent of Congress and ignores the clear legislative history of Section 315. Congress has consistently refused to enact any law immunizing licensees from liability for defamation. Nor is there any sound basis for the view of the Court below that immunity must be implied from federal "preemption" of the field of radio and television. Congress has not preempted the field of defamation, and there is no warrant in either Section 315 or elsewhere in the Act to imply Congressional intention to displace state law of libel with respect to political candidates. On the contrary, Section 414 of the Act specifically states that the Act does not "in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute". Under applicable decisions of this Court, state libel law should not be held to have been displaced in the absence of an explicit expression of that purpose by Congress.

Congress, by specifically rejecting all proposals to immunize broadcasters, intended that state law should govern. Insofar as a political speech is defamatory under state law, the broadcaster who broadcast the libel, rather than the non-candidate victim of the libel, must bear the loss.

III

The result below transforms Section 315 from a statute designed to give political candidates equal rights on the air into a statute which stimulates dissemination of reckless and irresponsible attacks on non-candidates who have no right of reply. Congress did not intend that radio and television should become a medium for inflicting such injury on persons who are not candidates. The decision below leads to inequality not equality (since Section 315 applies only to answering speakers) and to competitive political defamation rather than competition of political ideas and opinion. Thus the salutary "equal opportunities" objective of Congress is distorted to debase, rather than foster, democratic processes.

IV

The construction of Section 315 adopted by the North Dakota Court would render the statute invalid under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. It would deprive petitioner of redress for interference with a basic right which the North Dakota Constitution protects from impairment by the state legislature. The destruction of this remedy is not supported by any valid federal objective. To subject petitioner, and other non-candidates, to such irreparable injury is so remote from the objective of equalizing opportunities among political candidates, that the result must be deemed arbitrary and capricious, and a denial of due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment.

ARGUMENT

POINT I

Section 315 of the Federal Communications Act does not compel radio and television stations to broadcast defamation.

In 1927 when the broadcasting industry was in its infancy, Congress provided that if any licensee permits any candidate for public office to use its facilities it must afford "equal opportunities" to all other candidates for the same office. (Sec. 18 of the Radio Act of 1927.) At the same time and in the same section, Congress also provided that licensees "shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this section." Today these provisions appear as Section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934 (c. 652, 48 Stat. 1064, as amended, c. 879, 66 Stat. 717, 47 U. S. C. 315).

The purpose of this statute was to assure that every candidate be given the opportunity to answer his opponents, on the same terms granted to them. The no "censorship" proviso was wisely included to assure that the answering candidate should not be prevented by the station from expressing his views on political matters. The statutory purpose makes it clear that the no "censorship" proviso is in implementation of the right of reply; its sole aim is to prevent the answering candidate from being put at a disadvantage. Its purpose is not to grant a privilege of libeling which is not accorded to the first speaker. And clearly it is not the purpose of this section to authorize defamation of third persons who are not candidates at all and who have no right to reply.

(a) Deletion of libel is not "censorship."

Censorship may well be defined as the deletion of something which one has a legal right to say.

In 1932 a Nebraska radio station in defending a libel suit claimed that Section 315 compelled it to broadcast libelous statements about the plaintiff, a candidate for public office. The Supreme Court of Nebraska rejected this argument. It said that the "power of censorship" provision referred only to "censoring the words as to their political or partisan trend but does not give a licensee any privilege to join and assist in the publication of a libel nor grant any immunity from the consequences of such action." Sorenson v. Wood, 123 Neb. 348 (1932) at page 354. This Court dismissed an appeal from a subsequent ruling in this case sub nom. KFAB Broadcasting Co. v. Sorenson, 290 U. S. 599 (1933). In 1954 a New Hampshire court expressed the same view in Daniell v. Voice of New Hampshire, 10 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 2045 (Superior Court of N. H., Merrimack County 1954).

The year after this Court dismissed the Sorenson appeal, and apparently in an effort to overcome the effect of that case, an attempt was made to amend the law so as to immunize broadcasters from liability for libel actions based on speeches made by political candidates. (Hearings before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 2910, 73d Cong. 2nd Sess. pp. 63-64, 66-67.) This was defeated and Section 315 of the Act of 1934 was adopted, using language identical to its predecessor. A similar effort to include an immunity provision had been defeated when the original bill was enacted in 1927. (H. Rep. 1886, 69th Cong. 2nd Sess. 68 Cong. Rec. 2557, 2563.)

Although the law which is now Section 315 was passed in 1927, it was not until 1948—21 years later—that the Federal Communications Commission took the view that the no "censorship" provision precluded broadcasting licensees from deleting "possibly libelous matter". This view was expressed as dictum in a license renewal proceeding in which the license was renewed. Matter of Port Huron Broadcasting Co., 4 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 1. It is on the dicta in this proceeding that the Court below relies for its decision in the instant case (R 36-7). In Port Huron the Commission also gratuitously implied that the licensee would be immune from liability to an opposing candidate who had been libelled. A dissenting Commissioner called these remarks "not only unnecessary to a proper decision" of the case but also "extremely dangerous" (p. 6).

A broadcaster sought to have Port Huron reviewed in Houston Post Co. v. United States, 79 F. Supp. 199 (S. D. Tex. 1948) and a three-judge court held on August 3, 1948 that Port Huron was not a reviewable order, as its threatening language was mere dictum and could not be deemed to be a regulation of the Commission. Speaking for the Court, Judge Hutcheson clearly stated the view that Port Huron was unauthorized and erroneous:

> "There is no body of judicial opinion interpreting [Section 315] as the Commission has done, but such opinion as there is is directly to the contrary." (id., p. 203) and added that

> "It appears from the consistent legislative history of the Communications Act not that Congress has, but that it has not, given any clear indication that in using the word 'censorship' in Sec. 315, it intended to give it the meaning and effect accorded to it by the Commission's interpretation." (id., p. 204)

In neither Port Huron nor Houston Post was the question of libel of a non-candidate considered.

Following the decision in these cases, the question of the rights and responsibility of broadcasters regarding libel in campaign speeches was a principal subject matter of Hearings before a Special Committee to investigate the Federal Communications Commission, pursuant to H. Rep. 691, 80th Cong. 2nd Sess. At these hearings, in August of 1948, three days after the Houston Post case was decided, the Chairman of the Commission assured the Committee that for the time being no refusals to renew licenses would be based upon the action of a station in deleting libelous remarks (Hearings, p. 27).

The Chairman of the Committee indicated that the Committee expected the Commission not to penalize a licensee who deleted "obviously slanderous and libelous matter" and said:

> "We expect you to enforce the law as laid down by Congress in protecting the right of political candidates to express their views. But on the other hand, we are a little bit concerned, and I might say deeply concerned, in the light of this Port Huron decision, that some broadcasters may fear the loss of their licenses if they deny a candidate the right to make what anyone would construe as libelous or slanderous statements."

He asked for assurance that

> "For the time being, at least, until the matter is settled, the honest and conscientious broadcaster who uses ordinary common sense in trying to prevent obscene or slanderous or libelous statements from going over the air need not fear any action?"

To which the Chairman of the Commission replied:

> "Any capricious action; that is right."

In Maryland Drydock Co. v. NLRB, 183 F(2) 538 (C. A. 4 1950) the Labor Board argued that it was censorship in violation of Sec. 8(c) of the National Labor Relations Act for an employer to forbid circulation on plant premises of "scurrilous and defamatory" literature published by the union. In commenting on this argument the Court, through Chief Judge Parker, said:

> "We regard this contention as so lacking in merit as hardly to warrant consideration. Freedom of speech nowhere means freedom to publish libelous and defamatory matter." (at p. 541)

He also pointed out that:

> "no censorship is involved in holding that the employer may forbid distribution on his premises of statements which are defamatory and insulting and which tend to disrupt discipline." (at p. 542)

However, in 1951, in Matter of WDSU Broadcasting Company, 7 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 769, 773, the Commission, although renewing the license of a licensee who had "in good faith" deleted libel from a candidate's script, repeated its threat to act against licensees and declared that in the future it would

> "consider that there is no open question with respect to censorship on the part of the licensee of material broadcast under Sec. 315, and licensees will be expected to abide strictly by the provisions of that section."

This threat in the WDSU case is specifically pleaded as the basis of respondent's defense in this case (R 10-11) and was included by the District Court in North Dakota as a Finding of Fact (R 19-20) to support its decision in the present case. Although there was no mention of libelous statements about third persons in WDSU the Court below extended the Commission's doctrine and held that respondent "was under compulsion to publish the speech" (R 42).

The Court below, instead of construing the no "censorship" provision as a wholesome measure to prevent a station from censoring the political views of a candidate, as it was intended, has held it to be a command to the station to broadcast material that is concededly libelous per se (R 36) about petitioner, who is not a candidate. Nothing in the statute, the cases, nor in the Commission's rulings warrants this holding.[2]

[2] In two state proceedings courts have suggested that because licensees have "no power of censorship" under Section 315, they may not insist upon the deletion of libel, but in neither case was this the operative ground of decision. Thus, in Charles Parker Co. v. Silver City Crystal Co., 142 Conn. 605 (1955) while adverting to the no "censorship" clause, the Connecticut court refused the plaintiff relief on the ground that the alleged libel was privileged as a matter of state law and that the speaker's privilege extended to the radio station. In Josephson v. Knickerbocker Broadcasting Co., Inc., 38 N. Y. S. (2) 985 (Sup. Ct. N. Y. 1942) the New York Court found a defense based on Sec. 315 legally sufficient, but held further that in any event under state law the radio station could not be liable

(b) The licensee's duty to operate in the public interest cannot be avoided by claiming deletion of objectionable matter is "censorship."

A radio or television broadcaster is the gratuitous recipient of a highly valuable license. Only a limited number of them can be granted. It is a condition of the grant that the licensee operate in the public interest, convenience and necessity. (See, e.g., Sections 307, 312, and 316 of the Communications Act.)

It has never been held that the no "censorship" provision of Section 315 requires a licensee to transmit everything a candidate wishes to say. Even the Federal Communications Commission in the Port Huron case has stated that Section 315 does not relieve the broadcasters of their duty "to prevent the broadcast of statements or utterances in violation of the provisions of the Communications Act or any other federal law" (at p. 7). This language from the Port Huron opinion was quoted with approval by the Court below (R 37).

Thus neither the Commission nor the Court below consider that all deletions from the broadcasts of political candidates are "censorship." The necessity for some "censorship" is recognized by the Commission rule that a broadcaster may require an advance script of a candidate's speech without violating Section 315. (Use of Broadcast Facilities by Candidates for Public Office, Oct. 1, 1958, F. C. C. 58-936, Public Notice 63585, Q. A. No. 48.)

Clearly it cannot be considered "censorship" for a licensee to fulfill its duty not to broadcast "obscene, infor a libel extemporaneously inserted after the script had been examined by the station. Cf. Felix v. Westinghouse, 89 F. S. 740 (E. D. Pa. 1950) reversed 186 F. (2) 1 (C. A. 3 1950) cert. den. 341 U. S. 909 (1951).

decent or profane" language (18 U. S. C. §1463). This was recognized by the Court below (R 41) when it quoted from this Court's opinion in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U. S. 250 (1952) at page 257:

> "Such utterances * * * are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."

Nor can it be considered "censorship" to refuse to broadcast a speech advocating the overthrow of "any government in the United States by force or violence" (18 U. S. C. §2385) or counselling "insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny or refusal of duty by any member of the military or naval forces of the United States" (18 U. S. C. §2387) or speech violating related provisions of federal law.[3]

C. §1503); threaten physical violence to persons or property in furtherance of a plan to obstruct commerce (18 U. S. C. §1951); attempt to cause insubordination in the armed forces in time of war (18 U. S. C. §2388); or statements which are false and are intended to interfere with the operation of the armed forces of the United States (Ibid.).

Cf. Backun v. United States, 112 F. (2) 635 (C. A. 4 1940) as to liability for furnishing facilities knowing that they will be used to violate a criminal statute.

held to include oral threats. (United States v. Reid, 49 F. Supp. 313 (W. D. La. 1943) aff'd 136 F. (2) 476 (C. A. 5, 1943), cert. den. 320 U. S. 775 (1943).) Obviously a candidate for office would not be permitted to broadcast a promise that, if elected, he will thrash the President.

These are some examples of speech prohibited by federal law whose excision is obviously not "censorship" within the meaning of Section 315 of the Communications Act. Clearly, the licensee has a duty to prevent broadcasts, even by political candidates, falling within any of these categories. (Cf. Federal Communications Commission v. American Broadcasting Co., 347 U. S. 284 (1954).)

The licensee's duty to prevent unlawful speech must also extend to speech which is forbidden by state law. Thus it cannot be claimed that a licensee is required by Section 315 to broadcast speeches which the states make criminal, such as incitements to violence, or threats against persons or property, or defamatory charges against racial or religious groups (Cf. Beauharnais v. Illinois, supra).

And there is no valid basis for distinguishing criminal from civil libel for the purposes of Section 315. In most, if not all instances, the same words are the foundation for both civil and criminal liability.[4]

The line of demarcation in determining what speech a station may not broadcast and what speech is free from "censorship" must be the line adverted to by Judge Hutcheson in Houston Post, supra, when he said that:

> "Prohibitions against censorship have been uniformly held not to prevent the control of language which is beyond the scope of guarantees of free speech." (at p. 203)

[4] Developments in the Law of Defamation, 69 Harv. L. Rev. 875, 945 (1956); 53 C. J. S. Libel and Slander §283.

This accords with this Court's statement in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U. S. 568, 571, 572 (1942), that "There are certain well defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which has never been thought to raise any constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous and the insulting or fighting words—those which by their very utterance inflict injury * * *" Or as this Court put it on another occasion, obscene statements and libelous statements are "in the same class" (Beauharnais v. Illinois, supra, at p. 266). Quoting from its opinion in Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296 (1940) this Court reiterated in Chaplinsky that:

> "Resort to epithets or personal abuse is not in any sense communication of information or opinion safeguarded by the Constitution, and its punishment as a criminal act would raise no question under that instrument." (at p. 572)

It has been established that libelous utterances are not "within the area of constitutionally protected speech" Beauharnais v. Illinois, supra (at p. 266). The deletion of such utterances cannot therefore be regarded as "censorship."

See also Roth v. United States, 354 U. S. 476 (1957); Alberts v. California, 354 U. S. 476 (1957); Kingsley Books v. Brown, 354 U. S. 436 (1957); Near v. Minnesota, 283 U. S. 697, 715 (1931); U. S. ex rel. MSD Pub. Co. v. Burleson, 255 U. S. 407, 430 (1921) (Dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis).

The Court below construed Section 315 as a command to the stations to broadcast material prohibited by law. But, clearly, the prohibition against "censorship" does not mean that licensees may avoid their duty to operate in the public interest. What the prohibition does is to prevent them from controlling the political content of material which they broadcast. Section 315 does not mean that the licensees must do something that they otherwise are not permitted to do—i.e., broadcast defamation or other unlawful matter.

(c) The Commission does not exercise the "power of censorship" in violation of Section 326 of the Federal Communications Act when it refuses to license a station which has a record of defamation.

The Commission is required to consider the qualifications of an applicant to obtain or retain a license. In doing so it is the Commission's duty to examine the applicant's record and to refuse a license to applicants who do not meet accepted standards. The station's record in broadcasting defamatory or other objectionable matter is carefully considered. This is not "censorship," and does not violate the provisions of Section 326 of the Act which states:

> "Nothing in this chapter shall be understood or construed to give the Commission the power of censorship. * * *"

The Commission has never construed this section to prevent it from taking into account whether a licensee is guilty of defamation. It has correctly interpreted the denial of "the power of censorship" to mean no interference on its part with constitutionally protected speech—the interpretation which we contend must apply equally to Section 315.

Thus, in the Matter of WBNX Broadcasting Co. Inc., 4 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 242, 250 (1948), the Commission said:

> "Decided cases make it clear that censorship, within the meaning of the First Amendment, consists in suppressing opinions in advance of publication * * * or in deterring expression of opinion entitled to protection of the First Amendment by threat of subsequent punishment."

From the beginning of federal control over broadcasting, the regulatory agencies have conditioned licenses on the fulfillment of the duty to prevent the facilities from being used to spread personal abuse or defamation. It has never been held that such conditioning can be regarded as "censorship". The Federal Radio Commission early enunciated this requirement, and enforced it in the WCOT case (Federal Radio Commission, Second Annual Report (1928) p. 152).

In justifying its action to prevent licensees from using their facilities for purposes of abuse and airing private disputes, the Federal Radio Commission said that no "censorship" was involved, and that:

> "* * * the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech applies to the expression of political and religious opinions, to discussions, fair comments, and criticisms on matters of general public interest, or candidates, of men holding public office, and of political, social and economical (sic) issues." (Federal Radio Commission, Second Annual Report (1928) pp. 159, 160.)

In this instance, the Commission put a station on 30 day probation "to permit the station to continue on the air temporarily, so that it may have an opportunity to demonstrate that it is capable of a better showing."

Denial of a license renewal because defamation had been broadcast was specifically approved by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Trinity Methodist Church v. Federal Radio Comm., supra. In that case—which has been subsequently relied on by the FCC—the Court ruled that it was not "censorship" to deny a licensee "the continued use of an instrument of commerce for such purposes" (at p. 853). On the contrary, the Court held, denial of the air waves to a licensee disseminating defamation is required in the public interest, since otherwise "this great science, instead of a boon, will become a scourge, and the nation a theater for the display of individual passions, and the collision of personal interests." Free speech (or conversely, no "power of censorship") said the Court

> "does not mean that the government * * * may not refuse a renewal of license to one who has abused it to broadcast defamatory and untrue matter." (at p. 851)

Similarly in Independent Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 193 F. (2) 900 (App. D. C. 1951) the Court of Appeals sustained the denial of a license to an applicant who "was an expert in vituperation and vilification" and had been found by the Commission to have:

> "used intemperate language in his writings, sermons and broadcasts; * * * he had a constant habit of attacking the honesty and sincerity of those individuals and groups who did not agree with him * * *" (at p. 902)

There is no basis for holding that the word "censorship" as used in Section 315 of the Communications Act means something different from the word "censorship" as used in Section 326 of the same act. In the case of Section 326 the Commission, and in the case of Section 315, the licensee, may not exercise the "power of censorship". It is no more "censorship" for the Commission to deny a license to a station because it has permitted the broadcasting of defamation than it is for the licensee to delete defamatory matter—particularly when it is directed against a third person who is not a candidate. In both cases the purpose is to assure that the station is being operated in the public interest.

POINT II

Section 315 of Federal Communications Act gives no immunity to a licensee for broadcasting a candidate's defamatory statements.

Even if it is held that the prohibition of "censorship" in Section 315 means that libelous matter may not be excised by a licensee, this is a long way from holding that Congress intended to confer on broadcasters an immunity from liability to victims of defamation.

Section 315 does not say that stations may broadcast defamatory matter without liability to the person defamed. As we have seen, Congress struck such a provision from the original Act and Congress has consistently refused to include an immunity provision (supra, p. 15; see also infra, p. 27ff). Yet the Court below has read such language into the statute and has gone to the length of giving the respondent immunity from liability for the injury that a third person, not a candidate, has sustained from the broadcast of defamatory matter that it taped, recorded, filmed and broadcast over its facilities (R 17, 18). This conclusion, the North Dakota court felt, resulted from its holding that Section 315 compelled the station to broadcast the libelous statements. The Court said "We cannot believe that it was the intent of Congress to compel a station to broadcast libelous statements and at the same time subject it to the risk of defending actions for damages" (R 41). Instead of considering this as a reason for doubting the correctness of its holding that Section 315 compelled the broadcast of defamation, the Court chose to read into the statute the immunity provision that Congress rejected.

Thus the Court below has held that Section 315 gives a station immunity for broadcasting libelous statements about a person who is not a candidate and who has no opportunity, equal or otherwise, to reply. It construes the statute to immunize broadcasters from liability, and takes away a valuable right protected by the Constitution of North Dakota—a right which it was held in this very case could not be destroyed under state law (R 20-22). It does so in spite of the provisions of Section 414 of the Communications Act, which says:

> "Nothing in this chapter contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this chapter are in addition to such remedies."

(a) Congress has consistently refused to grant immunity.

Congress did not provide immunity in the language of Section 315 and did not intend that the broadcasters be immunized from libel claims. Congress has repeatedly declined to do exactly what the North Dakota Court says it has done. A resume of the legislative history appears in the Petition for a Writ of Certiorari (pp. 17-22).[5] It refutes the reasoning adopted by the North Dakota Court.

[5] See also S. 1437, 85 Cong. 1st Sess. §401, which was referred to Committee in 1957 and not reported out:

> "No action, either civil or criminal, shall be maintained by any person in any court against any licensee * * * because of any defamatory statement made by a legally qualified candidate for public office in a broadcast made under the provisions of this section" unless licensee wilfully participates with intent to defame.

Section 18 of the Radio Act of 1927 contained no immunity provision. Such a provision had been passed by the Senate (H. R. 9971, 69 Cong. 1st Sess. §4; 67 Cong. Rec. 12,505) but was stricken out in conference (supra, p. 15).

This action, and the subsequent action of Congress in 1934, in reenacting Section 18 as Section 315 without change, negatives the idea that immunity was conferred by silence. For in the interval the Supreme Court of Nebraska had rejected in the Sorensen case an immunity claim based on Section 315. This case had been specifically called to the attention of Congress. (Hearings before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 2910, 73rd Cong., 2d Sess. pp. 63-64, 66-67). Although the industry asked Congress to extend immunity when Congress made an overall revision and enacted the Communications Act in 1934, Congress took no action to overrule Sorenson and reenacted, as Section 315, the exact language of Section 18. [Hearings before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on H. R. 7716, 72d Cong., 2d Sess. pp. 9-11; Hearings before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 2910, 73rd Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 63-64, 66-67.]

It must be concluded, therefore, that Congress felt that Section 18 had been correctly interpreted by the Nebraska Court. There is no warrant for assuming that when it enacted Section 315 in the Communications Act in 1934 Congress intended to confer an immunity which it had rejected in 1927 and which Sorenson said did not exist.

Ever since 1934 Congress has adhered to this position. Frequent efforts to immunize stations from defamation claims based on broadcasts by political candidates under Section 315 have failed. Congress has repeatedly said "No" to each plan for immunization.

Until the Commission made its ruling in Port Huron in 1948 it apparently believed that no immunity had been granted by Congress. Thus in 1940 the Commission avoided the issue and in Matter of Bellingham Broadcasting Co., 8 F. C. C. 159, (1940) said that "determination of the question of censorship involves consideration of whether the material was libelous as a matter of law * * * and whether, if libelous, a licensee possesses the legal right to expunge from a proposed broadcast a libelous statement." (p. 172)

Thereafter the Commission apparently decided that adoption of an immunity provision would be desirable. It accordingly proposed such legislation to Congress in 1943. (Hearings before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 814, 78th Cong. 1st Sess., p. 945; id. at pp. 63-65, 162, 950-51.) It did not announce, as it subsequently did in 1948 in Port Huron, that Section 315 conferred immunity by inference. Congress turned this proposal down, and the Commission's amendment died in committee. In 1947 another immunity proposal failed to pass the Senate. (Sen. Rep. 156, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 13) and a companion bill died in committee in the House (H. R. 3595, 80th Cong., 1st Sess.).

After these failures the Commission, in Port Huron, in 1948, changed its position and claimed that immunity was implicit in Section 315. But Congress did not accept this view. It continued to reject immunity proposals, not on the ground that Section 315 had granted immunity, as claimed by the Commission in its Port Huron doctrine, but because Congress disapproved of this doctrine.

Very soon after the Port Huron doctrine was announced, the Chairman of the Special Committee to Investigate the Federal Communications Commission, pursuant to H. R. Res. 691, 80th Congress, 2d Session, took the Commission to task for the position it had espoused in Port Huron. As a result the Commission withdrew from its Port Huron theory, and its Chairman, as we have seen, assured the Committee that the Commission would not penalize licensees "capriciously" for deleting libel (see p. 17, supra).

Three years later, in 1951, the House passed an amendment to Section 315 to confer immunity, thereby indicating clearly its belief that immunity had not been granted by the statute. But the amendment was again rejected in conference (H. Rep. 2426, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., p. 21).

This action of the Conference Committee in 1951 refutes the basis for the Port Huron doctrine and, of course, was the opposite of acquiescence in it. Since 1951 there have been further immunity proposals;[6] none of them has been reported favorably by any committee of Congress.

The Commission in the WDSU case, supra, also in 1951, significantly omitted any assertion that Section 315 extends immunity to broadcasters. And in the Regulations promulgated by it prior to the decision of the instant case the Commission stated that "This is a matter which in the absence of any amendment to the law will have to be definitely decided by the courts." (19 Fed. Reg. 5951) In light of this legislative history there can be only one conclusion. Congress has not immunized broadcasters from liability for defamation uttered by political candidates.

(b) The respondent is not immunized against the petitioner's libel claim by any Congressional "preemption" of the field of broadcasting.

The holding below that Section 315 of the Communications Act confers immunity on stations for carrying defamation by political candidates and supersedes state law was based on the premise that Congress had "preempted the field" of communications regulation (R 38-40).

[6] See Petition for Certiorari, pp. 20, 21; footnote 5, supra.

Such an argument begs the question. It assumes that Congress did intend to grant immunity from state libel laws to broadcasters. Had that been Congress' intention, it is fair to assume that it would have said so. As Mr. Justice Frankfurter said in Bethlehem Steel Co. v. New York Labor Relations Board, 330 U. S. 767 (1947): "Congress can speak with drastic clarity whenever it chooses to assure full federal authority, completely displacing the states". Accordingly, he pointed out, "Congress needs no help from generous judicial implication to achieve the supersession of state authority * * * any indulgence in construction shall be in favor of the states." (at p. 780)

Concededly federal regulation supersedes state law where the two are inconsistent. For example, when a state sought to regulate the content of television programs by requiring the prior approval of state administrative officials to the telecasting of films, the state regulation was invalid. Allen B. Dumont Laboratories Inc. v. Carroll, 184 F. (2) 153 (C. A. 3d, 1950) cert. den. 340 U. S. 929 (1950).

But Congress in Section 315 did not choose to confer immunity on licensees for broadcasting libel. As seen above (p. 27ff) it has consistently refused to do so. And the Communications Act itself (48 Stat. 1099, 47 U. S. C. Section 414) specifically states:

> "Nothing in this chapter contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this chapter are in addition to such remedies."

The "chapter" referred to is the entire Communications Act.

This section was copied verbatim from the Interstate Commerce Act. Its purpose there was to make it plain that, by giving shippers rights against carriers under federal law, Congress had not "withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the state courts * * * the whole subject of liability of carriers to shippers in interstate commerce * * * and * * * deprive(d) the state courts of their general and concurrent jurisdiction." Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Puritan Coal Mining Co., 237 U. S. 121, 130 (1915). It is equally obvious that Congress did not in enacting the Federal Communications Act intend to abrogate state libel laws.

In a case interpreting Section 414, Curran v. Mackay Radio and Telephone Co., 123 F. Supp. 83 (S. D. N. Y. 1954), it was held that an employee of a common carrier does not have a cause of action under the Communications Act for injuries caused by defective equipment, the use of which was a violation of the Act by the carrier. But in dicta, the court went on to say that Congress did not by the Communications Act intend to preempt the field of tort liability of a common carrier, so as to bar a suit by an employee of a carrier for personal injuries.

The North Dakota Supreme Court in the instant case appears to carry the occupation of the field doctrine so far as to suggest that by enacting the Communications Act Congress has preempted the entire field of liability for defamatory broadcasts. This is clearly not so. For speakers not broadcasting under Section 315, state law applies. And when the issue is narrowed to Section 315, both the legislative history and previous decisions of this Court lead to the conclusion that Congress did not, by enacting that section, intend to displace state libel law. This Court has held that state law continues in effect, despite close inter-relationship with federal regulation of communications. In Radio Station WOW, Inc. v. Johnson, 326 U. S. 120 (1945), a state court adjudication of fraud in the transfer of an FCC license was upheld. And in Regents of the University System of Georgia v. Carroll, 338 U. S. 586 (1950) a state court judgment was upheld awarding damages for breach of a contract to operate a radio station, which contract the Commission had directed the licensee to abrogate as a condition of retaining its license. Certainly who retains a license to broadcast, and who actually operates a radio station, are questions far more intimately connected with the federal scheme of regulation of the airwaves than is the question whether a defamed third person may recover damages from a broadcasting station disseminating defamation by a political candidate.

Two recent cases decided by this Court are also relevant: International Assn. of Machinists v. Gonzales, 356 U. S. 617 (1958), and International Union, UAW v. Russell, 356 U. S. 634 (1958) both of which involved the Taft-Hartley Act, which certainly provides a comprehensive scheme of regulation of labor relations [Weber v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 348 U. S. 468, 489-91, 499-500 (1955)]. Yet in the Gonzales case this Court held that a state court may entertain a breach of contract action by a union member against the union, despite the fact that the conduct complained of was also an unfair labor practice for which specific remedies are provided under the federal statute. And the Russell case involved a tort action against a union for malicious interference with an employment contract, which also gave rise to a Taft-Hartley Act unfair labor practice. The Taft-Hartley Act specifically deals with the very wrongs which were the subject matter of the Gonzales and Russell actions, while in the instant case there is no provision in the Communications Act of any remedy for the tort of defamation here involved. In both Gonzales and Russell this Court emphasized that federal preemption should not be implied where the result would be to prevent the plaintiff from securing full redress. As the Court said in Russell (at p. 646):

> "An employee's right to recover in the state courts, all damages caused him by this kind of tortious conduct cannot fairly be said to be pre-empted without a clearer declaration of Congressional policy than we find here".[7]

Apart from the cases, such as those discussed above, involving the validity of general rules of state law which do not purport to regulate the industry covered by federal regulation—of which the state law of libel is an example—there is also the line of cases involving direct state regulation, under the police power, of matters also subject to federal regulation. The possibilities of conflict are of course much stronger in this situation; yet under the standards applied by this Court in such cases the state rule of law survives. See, e.g., Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 137, 148 (1902); Kelly v. Washington, 302 U. S. 1, 10 (1937); cf. the standards for determining whether state action is precluded by a federal regulatory scheme set forth in Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Nelson, 350 U. S. 497, 502, 504, 505 (1956).

[7] It has been suggested (Note, The Supreme Court, 1957 Term, 72 Harv. L. Rev. 77, 144 (1958)) that the touchstone of Russell and Gonzales was that the causes of action arose "under a state law of general application based upon an evaluation of interests not confined to labor relations." This rationale would apply even more clearly to the instant case, where the state law was the common law of libel, not confined in its application to broadcast defamation. See also Cox, Federalism in the Law of Labor Relations, 67 Harv. L. Rev. 1297, 1321-2 (1954): "If an employer were to call a union organizer a 'foreign-born Communist,' his speech would not be an unfair labor practice nor should a state be permitted to punish him for interfering with employee organization. A state court should be free nevertheless to entertain an action for damages based upon the general law of defamation."

The instant case involves a question similar to that examined in the police power cases, since the decision of the court below, if upheld, would not only prevent civil suits for libel but would also invalidate state criminal libel statutes wherever they are applicable to the broadcasting stations. As for the universality of state criminal libel laws, see Beauharnais v. Illinois, supra, at p. 255 n. 5.

As Chief Justice Marshall held in Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 443 (1821), for Congress to override state penal law "is a very serious measure, which Congress cannot be supposed to adopt lightly." Accordingly, he ruled, the Court would not find such overruling unless the Congressional intention was "clearly and unequivocally expressed" (ibid.).

Certainly no such intention, "clearly and unequivocally expressed" to invalidate state criminal libel laws, much less state rules of tort liability, appears in the Communications Act.

Not only has Congress specifically refused to provide immunity to the broadcasting stations under Section 315; it is equally clear that the regulatory scheme provided by Congress will not in any way be frustrated if there is no such immunity. State law has not been superseded. It must govern the instant case.

Under the relevant state law, it is clear that the respondent is liable for the defamation here involved. In this case the District Court in North Dakota held unconstitutional a state statute enacted in 1953, which purported to immunize the licensee of a broadcasting station from liability for "any defamatory statement published or uttered in or as a part of a visual or sound radio broadcast by one other than (the) owner, licensee or operator, or agent or employee thereof." (NDRC §14-0209) (R 21, 22). The Court held that the application of this state-created immunity to the case at bar would deprive the petitioner of its rights under the North Dakota Constitution.[8] Thus, were it not for the immunity supposedly conferred on the respondent by Section 315 on the theory that it has "preempted" the field, the petitioner would have under North Dakota law a cause of action for defamation against the respondent. We submit that Section 315 has not "preempted" this field so as to supersede the North Dakota law of defamation, which accordingly governs the rights of the parties in this case.

(c) In enacting Section 315 Congress did not abrogate state law, but left to the states the determination of the broadcaster's liability for defamation.

Congressional refusal to grant immunity to stations for broadcasting libelous statements of political candidates, leaves the question of their legal responsibility to applicable state law. In so doing, Congress recognized that this is properly a subject for local determination. The law of defamation, like the law of obscenity, is "preeminently a matter of state concern." Alberts v. State of California, 354 U. S. 476 (1957), concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan at p. 502.

[8] The North Dakota Constitution in its Declaration of Rights makes protection of reputation a fundamental right, on a plane with protection of life and liberty, as follows:

(a) Article I, Sec. 1:

"All men * * * have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; acquiring, possessing and protecting property and reputation, and pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness."

(b) Article I, Sec. 9:

"Every man may freely write, speak and publish his opinions, being responsible for the abuse of that privilege."

(c) Article I, Sec. 22:

"All courts shall be open, and every man in his lands, goods, person or reputation shall have remedy by due process of law * * *"

The subject of freedom of discussion in political campaigns is not a new one. Members of Congress, from their own experience, have first-hand familiarity with it. Had they intended to enact a basically new concept when they passed the Radio Act of 1927, they would have so stated. Instead, they refused to confer immunity, thereby indicating that they intended to leave the question of liability to the gradual process of determination by the states, a process which can continue to take into account the needs and desires of state policy. This enables decisions to be made in specific cases, in light of the facts, including the actual role played by the licensee; whether, for example, as in this case, the licensee participated in the recording of the script as well as in the broadcasting of the libel. Another pertinent fact would be whether the victim was afforded the opportunity to reply or whether the victim was a candidate or, as in this case, a non-candidate with no right to reply to concededly libelous matter which the station had broadcast.

Section 315 specifically states that a station is under no obligation to accept the speeches of political candidates. As we have seen, it nowhere states that a station is exempt from its common law liability for damages inflicted by the libel that it broadcasts. Even if it be held that a station is compelled to broadcast a candidate's libelous statement, it is not unreasonable to conclude that Congress intended that the station which broadcasts the libel, rather than those libelled, should bear the loss. Campaign broadcasts are a lucrative source of income to such licensees. The brief amicus filed below by the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters, estimated broadcasters' revenue from the 1956 federal election as $10,000,000.

The station can, as a practical matter, take out insurance against such loss (Cf. Coffey v. Midland Broadcasting Co., 8 F. Supp. 889 (W. D. Mo. 1934)) or adjust its charges to advertisers and other consumers to spread the risk [Cf. Vold, Defamatory Interpolations in Radio Broadcasts, 88 U. Pa. L. Rev. 249 (1940)] or obtain a suitable indemnity agreement from the speaker or his sponsor.[9]

Yet the Court below assumed that Congress could not have intended to deny the right to delete libel without providing immunity. It apparently overlooked the fact that liability without fault has in many situations become part of the fabric of the law.[10] This has long been the case in the field of defamation. Newspapers, for example, have traditionally been held liable for defamatory statements regardless of fault. In Peck v. Tribune Co., 214 U. S. 185, 189 (1909), Mr. Justice Holmes said:

> "If the publication was libelous, the defendant took the risk. As was said of such matters by Lord Mansfield, 'whatever a man publishes, he publishes at his peril' * * *"

In 1956, the National Association of Radio & Television Broadcasters published "A Political Broadcast Catechism" containing, for the guidance of broadcasters, an "Agreement Form for Political Broadcasts" which included the following language:

> "I further agree to indemnify and hold harmless the station for any damages or liability that may ensue from the performance of said broadcast."

[10] Mr. Justice Brandeis, dissenting, in Crowell v. Benson, 285 U. S. 22, 82 (1932); Pound, The End of the Law as Developed in Legal Rules and Doctrines, 27 Harv. L. Rev. 195, 233 (1914); Vold, The Basis for Liability for Defamation by Radio, 19 Minn. L. Rev. 611, 626-31 (1935); Vold, Defamatory Interpolations in Radio Broadcasts, 88 U. Pa. L. Rev. 249, 251-52, 281-89 (1940). Desirable social purposes may be achieved by passing the risk of loss from the innocent victim directly or indirectly to the consumers or beneficiaries of the activity which generates the loss.

Congressional determination not to destroy state remedies for defamation is consistent with historic common law protection of the reputation of the individual. It is also consistent with Congress' own declaration, specifically stated in Section 414, that nothing in the Act "shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute."

POINT III

The holding below, particularly in its effect upon persons who are not candidates, subverts the purpose of Section 315 and the policy of the Federal Communications Act.

Petitioner is not a "candidate for any public office". Section 315 gives it no opportunity to reply. The Court below has found that respondent broadcast a speech believed by respondent to contain false and libelous statements about petitioner (R 17) and used its equipment and facilities in photographing, filming and reproducing the speech (R 17). Nevertheless the Court below held that petitioner has no redress against respondent, although it is conceded that the language in the speech was libelous per se (R 36). This harsh result is based upon the Court's decision that Section 315 compelled respondent to give the broadcast (R 42) and rendered it immune from liability for defamation (R 43).

This decision requiring broadcast of libels on persons who are not candidates and who have no right to reply, in no way carries out the congressional purpose to equalize opportunities among candidates. Instead, it permits serious injury to the reputation of any person whom a candidate chooses to attack. The category of potential victims is unlimited. There is no basis, we submit, for attributing to Congress a purpose to subject persons who are not candidates to such abuse. We submit that the dissenting opinion was clearly correct in stating:

> "It does not appear that the public interest would be served by making the reputations of innocent third parties subject to destruction without recourse to the disseminator by an irresponsible candidate for public office broadcasting (fol. 56) under the aegis of Section 315 or that Congress intended licensees to be rendered powerless to prevent such a result." (R. 46)

Moreover the effect of the decision is to create inequality, not equality, among political candidates. Instead of giving rival candidates a right equal to that given to the original speaker, it gives them greater rights. For they can require stations to broadcast defamation about their opponents or anyone else. This the first speaker cannot do.[11]

If the station is compelled to allow the broadcast of such libelous material, the entire statutory structure is distorted. Not only is there no equality but the door is opened to compel stations to participate in a gutter campaign against anybody and anything.

There is no reason to assume that Congress intended to stimulate deterioration of the mores of political debate when it sought to equalize opportunities among candidates. The public interest standard, which is the heart of the Act, has been consistently construed to require responsible and orderly administration of the air waves by the licensees and to forbid their dissemination of defamation.

[11] Weiss v. Los Angeles Broadcasting Co., 163 F. (2d) 313, (C. A. 9 1947) cert. den. 333 U. S. 876 (1948); Daniell v. Voice of New Hampshire, 10 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 2045 (Superior Court N. H., Merrimack Co. 1954).

It is fundamentally inconsistent with this standard to decide that, where political contests are involved, the air should be dedicated to dissemination of speech which flouts the laws of libel. This, however, is an inevitable result of the decision below.

As the Memorandum for the United States as amicus curiae submitted in support of the petition for certiorari aptly said, under the construction of the statute given by the court below "third persons as well as opposing candidates will suffer" and "In such cases, the licensee would be powerless to prevent the very widespread dissemination of patently defamatory statements, which might significantly affect the outcome of the particular election" (p. 3.) Unrestrained dissemination of libel in a political campaign does not contribute to reasoned results in elections. On the contrary, it tends to sow distrust, and to weaken the fibre of the body politic.

As this Court said in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, supra, at page 572.

> "It has been well observed that such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."

This was quoted with approval by the Court below (R. 41).

The result of the holding that a candidate can compel a station to broadcast libel gives him the opportunity to use his broadcast time for any purpose he wishes. The FCC has stated (Matter of WMCA, 7 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 1132 (1952)) that a "use" under Section 315 need not directly aid his candidacy, nor relate to his own qualifications for office. Thus, irresponsible candidates, under the decision, can compel broadcast licensees to disseminate any kind of irrelevant, malicious abuse, to take out any sort of grudge against any person, candidate or not.

It is true that in the "Syllabus by the Court," the Court below stated that "The inhibition against censorship imposed by Section 315" applies to statements which "are germane to the political issues discussed by such candidates" (R 31). However, the opinion is not so limited and such a view is clearly inconsistent with the spirit of the Commission's ruling in the WMCA case, supra. In any event, a test of "germaneness" would vest the stations with a real "censorship" power directly in conflict with Section 315. There are no standards available to judge what is or is not "germane". On the other hand, deletion of libel is, as we have shown, not censorship and there is an existing body of law as to what is and is not libelous. This is the type of question with which the licensees must deal every day in order to avoid liability for defamation on the one hand and to assure that they are operating in the public interest on the other.

Moreover, the decision below in no way inhibits the repetition of libel by an irresponsible candidate who may harass his victim by repeating the libel. Indeed, this is precisely what the speaker in this case has done.[12] No matter how false and foul the libel, no matter how often it is repeated, there is, under the holding, no liability of the broadcasting station. Nor is the remedy against the speaker necessarily adequate to prevent such abuse. The dissenting opinion below well said that "defamation acquires its devastating effect through dissemination rather than authorship and that under the law of libel damages are awarded not for the utterance but for the effect" (R 47).

[12] See National Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America v. Townley and Northern States Broadcasting, U. S. District Court for District of North Dakota, Civil Action No. 140. Complaint filed on August 28, 1958, and based on speech made by Townley on June 18, 1958. In the broadcast complained of in the instant case Mr. Townley announced that he "will talk over KFYR at 7:30 and KFGO at 8:30 every night this week" (R 19).

A defamatory broadcast may be disseminated across the country, while the speaker, even if financially responsible, may not be within the jurisdiction where the libeled person is located and presumably has suffered the greatest injury, and the speaker may not be amenable to process.

The significance of the danger is indicated by the number of persons who can avail themselves of this use (or mis-use) of broadcasting facilities under this construction of Section 315 and by the magnitude of the broadcasting arena. According to a year-end report of the FCC the nation has more radio and television sets than it has people. There are now 150,000,000 radios and 50,000,000 T. V. receivers in the United States (N. Y. Times, January 1, 1959).

Section 315 covers all elections throughout the country at every level of government. There are over 116,000 units of government including national, state and local. (THE MUNICIPAL YEAR BOOK—1956, Chicago: The International City Managers Association, p. 13.) Many of these hold primaries as well as elections for the more than 1,000,000 candidates that are elected annually in the United States. (BAILEY, SAMUEL, AND BALDWIN, GOVERNMENT IN AMERICA, p. 241.) Many elections include not only the candidates of the two major parties but, as in the election here involved, at least one more candidate.

It is equally important to note the ease with which one may become a candidate. In North Dakota, for example, an independent candidate for the United States Senate needs only 300 signatures to qualify (Election Law Guidebook of the Senate Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, 85th Cong., 2d Sess. 111-125 (1958)).[13] And in states where write-in candidates are permitted, a person can "legally qualify" so as to invoke Section 315 merely by publicly announcing his candidacy (Hearings on Communications Act Amendments before Subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 84th Cong., 2d Sess. 261).

[13] In Tennessee, a person can run for state office by filing a petition with 15 signatures. In 13 other states, the requirement is between 50 and 800 signatures. (Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Delaware, Idaho, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Nebraska, Rhode Island, Utah, Virginia and Wyoming.) Ibid., see also Comment, 57 Yale L. J. 1292 (1948).

The number of elective offices throughout the country and the ease with which one may become a candidate is a tribute to our democracy. But it also indicates the huge number of candidates who are given equal opportunity rights under Section 315.

Those who are not candidates will suffer most if the interpretation of the court below is allowed to stand. As between the candidates not only is there the right of reply, but a wide latitude is permitted under state libel law. Under state law, by running for office a candidate necessarily becomes a legitimate subject of free discussion, and "public property" as this Court has put it (Beauharnais v. Illinois, supra, at p. 263, n. 18). See also 3 Restatement of Torts, Sections 606, 607 and Abell v. Cornwall Industrial Corp., 241 N. Y. 327 (1925). Members of Congress are well aware of the importance of broadcasting in political campaigns. Their awareness of its importance was evidenced by their concern after the Port Huron decision was rendered (supra, pp. 16-17). The language of Section 315 and Congress' refusal to amend it lead to the inevitable conclusion that Section 315 was not intended to, and does not, compel the broadcast of libel against a third person, nor give immunity to a station which not only circulates but participates in producing such a libel. That no such result was intended is borne out by the fact that in none of the discussions and debates was any suggestion made that the statute would license defamation of non-candidates.

Opening the airways to unrestricted defamation gives a speaker access to facilities for reaching the greatest audience that has ever been addressed. It has been estimated that sixty-five million people heard President Eisenhower's talk on February 29, 1956. (N. Y. Herald Tribune, March 1, 1956.) If a candidate chooses to use television as a forum for defamation, the damage inflicted is immeasurable. It can never be undone. Many irresponsible persons can become "candidates" and, under the construction of Section 315 adopted by the North Dakota Court, use radio and television to spread defamation which could not be otherwise published in any other media of communication.

The same considerations which make it against the public interest to publish libel in newspapers apply with equal—or even greater—force with regard to broadcasts over radio and television. Presumably, newspapers and other media, would be liable for the publication of the identical defamatory statements that licensees of broadcasting stations could make with impunity under the decision of the Court below. Yet the result of the decision of the Court below is that libel by radio and television, which does the most damage, must be broadcast. The decision below compels the broadcaster to commit an act which in all other contexts is illegal. When Congress forbade "censorship" of campaign speeches it did not intend to accomplish such bizarre results.[14]

[14] Moreover, the decision below leaves unanswered such questions as whether the network under whose auspices a candidate's speech is broadcast but which is not itself licensed by the FCC is liable for the defamation even though the individual stations comprising the network are not; whether to the extent newspapers become "published" via the airwaves by the facsimile process, they too will be immune to claims of defamation by candidates and third persons.

We submit that the holding that licensees must broadcast libelous statements, particularly about persons who are not candidates, subverts the purpose of Section 315 and the policy of the Communications Act.

POINT IV

As construed below and applied to Petitioner Section 315 violates the Fifth Amendment.

Instead of construing Section 315 so as to "adopt that reasonable interpretation which removes it furthest from constitutional infirmity" (Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U. S. 77, 84 (1949); United States v. Witkowitz, 353 U. S. 194 (1957)), the Court below held that it sanctioned the publication of libel against a person not a candidate for public office. We submit that if this holding of the North Dakota Supreme Court correctly construes Section 315, then as applied to petitioner in this case that section violates the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The Supreme Court of Nebraska said in Sorenson v. Wood, supra (p. 354):

> "We do not think congress intended by this language in the radio act to authorize or sanction the publication of libel, and thus to raise an issue with the Federal constitutional provisions prohibiting the taking of property without due process of law or without payment of just compensation. Constitution, Fifth Amendment."

It is not disputed that under North Dakota law, petitioner has a cause of action for libel against respondent. Indeed it has been held in the present case that a North Dakota statute purporting to immunize respondent from liability for broadcasting libel violates provisions of the North Dakota Constitution, which guarantees protection of "reputation" "by due process of law" (supra, p. 36). Yet the Court below has denied the injured party the relief guaranteed to it under the North Dakota Constitution and given the respondent the immunity attempted to be given in a state statute that was held to violate the state Constitution. This strange result not only was unauthorized by the provisions of Section 315 but is contrary to the intent of Congress, which repeatedly has refused to enact the language (supra, p. 27ff) which the North Dakota Court has now read into the statute.

Other states whose constitutions protect the right of reputation "equally with the right to the enjoyment of life, liberty and property" (Marion v. Davis, 217 Ala. 16 (1927)) have similarly held that state laws attempting to deprive libel victims of adequate remedy are invalid. Thus, in Michigan it has been held that > "There is no room for holding in a constitutional system that private reputation is any more subject to be removed by statute from full legal protection than life, liberty, or property. It is one of those rights, necessary to human society that underlie the whole scheme of civilization" Park v. Detroit Free Press Co. 72 Mich. 560, 566 (1888).

Likewise, in New Jersey it has been held that > " * * * the people of this State, who ordained the Constitution, have not empowered the legislative body to authorize a newspaper publisher or any other citizen to unjustly injure his neighbor's reputation without making compensation for that injury". (Neafie v. Hoboken Printing & Publishing Co., 75 N. J. L. 564 (1907).

To the same effect are Byers v. Meridian Printing Co., 84 Ohio State Reports 408 (1911); Harrison v. Krehbiel, 68 Kan. 670 (1904). McGee v. Baumgartner, 121 Mich. 287 (1899). See also Marion v. Davis, supra; Kennedy v. Item Co., 213 La. 347 (1948).

To permit a broadcaster to publish libel by a candidate against a third person who is not a candidate, free of liability to the victim, is arbitrary and capricious, and, we submit, deprives the victim of property without due process of law.

The effect of Section 315 as applied by the Court below is to deprive the victim of redress against respondent, the primary disseminator of the libel. But for the act of dissemination on radio and television, the libel may inflict little damage. As the court said in Coffey, supra, but for what the broadcaster "has done, the victim of the defamation would not have been hurt" (p. 890). Since redress against the speaker may well prove inadequate (supra, pp. 42, 43) the petitioner is deprived of any remedy. The effect of publication by radio and television is enormous. The magnitude of the impact is so great that the damage is far beyond that caused by publication through any other medium. This is not only because the audience is so vast, but because the libel is dramatized by the immediacy of the voice and image of the speaker and this dramatic effect may be heightened by use of the manifold techniques of visual propaganda.

The statute, intended to give a candidate the equal opportunity to answer his opponent, has now been held to be a weapon to compel the station to broadcast, with immunity, libelous statements, not about the candidate, but about a third person who is not a candidate. Such a holding with its devastating consequences, we maintain, if construed to be authorized by Section 315 deprives the petitioner of its property without due process of law. It makes lawful an unlawful act. This is forbidden by the doctrine of Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312 (1921) and Brinkerhoff-Faris Trust and Saving Co. v. Hill, 281 U. S. 673 (1930). Section 315 as thus construed destroys petitioner's right to protection against injury to its fundamental property right by another who has "no special relation" to it. Truax v. Corrigan, supra, at 329.

There is no "permissible legislative objective" (Silver v. Silver, 280 U. S. 117, 122 (1929)) for putting a third person in the position of a helpless target. Whatever basis there might be to compel libel to be broadcast by a candidate against his opponent, there is none that can justify such action against persons who are not candidates. Nor is there rational basis for the assumption, which necessarily underlies Section 315 as construed, that safeguarding equal opportunity precludes a remedy for deliberate defamation of third persons. Such extreme measures are not necessary to insure equality on the air.

It is submitted that the action of the Court below in applying Section 315 to petitioner is capricious and subjects its reputation to injury without adequate redress. The statute, as thus applied, deprives the petitioner of property with due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment.

The judgment below should be reversed.

APPENDIX A

Predecessor Statutes

The Radio Act of 1927, Sec. 18, 44 Stat. 1170:

Sec. 18. If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station, and the licensing authority shall make rules and regulations to carry this provision into effect: Provided, That such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the authority of this paragraph. No obligation is hereby imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate.

The Federal Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1088:

Sec. 15. If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station, and the Commission shall make rules and regulations to carry this provision into effect: Provided, That such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the authority of this section. No obligation is hereby imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate.

My dear Ed:

The "Harold Gardiner Satelites" have been in orbit since our last dinner meeting November 11, 1958. Some interesting work papers have been sent in by members of the group. I have discussed projects in general terms with Prof. Bernard Berelson, as suggested by Paul Ylvisaker, and with Prof. Siepmann, as suggested by Ed Murrow.

From various responses I think we are making some progress and at least have cleared away much of the underbruch for the next stage of the discussions. I had hoped to set up another meeting before I leave for London and the East tomorrow. I figured it would be well to center the next meeting around Prof. Berelson. His shift from the University of Chicago to New York made his attendance impossible at this time.

I will be away for about a month but in the meanwhile if anyone of you has a proposal, communicate with Alan Schwartz at this office and he will round-robin the idea. Alan will have the use of my apartment if it will advantage the group for dinner. At the next meeting it might be well to invite one or two additional people, as suggested by Phil Scharper.

Happy New Year!

Dear Senator :

With this letter we send you a copy of a book which the undersigned feel to be of importance to the nation. It is titled THE UGLY AMERICAN and is by William J. Lederer and Eugene Burdick. It is concerned with the Americans who go overseas for the various governmental agencies, their activities abroad, and the policies they are entrusted to carry out.

The book is written in the form of fiction--a device by which the authors have reached a very large popular audience--but it is based squarely on fact. It seems to us beyond question that the authors know their facts. We feel their message to be so important that we urge you, in the strongest terms, to read THE UGLY AMERICAN.

It may be of interest to note that according to Columbia Broadcasting Company News, THE UGLY AMERICAN has been read by the President and was largely responsible for the creation of the Draper Committee.

Enc

SHEIKH ABDULLAH was the leader of the Jammu and Kashmir National Conference, the political party in Kashmir which worked in close collaboration with the Indian National Congress. The Congress was the well-known political organization of Mahatma Gandhi and Mr. Nehru.

When the Maharajah (the hereditary feudal ruler) of Kashmir acceded to India on October 27, 1947, the Government of India declared that they had accepted this accession because it was supported by Sheikh Abdullah, the most popular leader of Kashmir. The actual words in India's official communication to the Security Council, made on January 1, 1948, are:

> "An appeal for help was also simultaneously received by the Government of India from the largest political organization in Kashmir, the National Conference, headed by Sheikh Abdullah. The Conference further strongly supported the request for the State's accession to the Indian Dominion. The Government of India were thus approached, not only officially by the State authorities, but also on behalf of the people of Kashmir, both for military aid and for accession of the State to India."

This assertion was repeated time and again. The Indian Representative stated at the meeting of the Security Council on January 23, 1948, that Kashmir's offer of accession to India was accepted because it came "not only from the ruler" but also from "the popular leader". He added that, even so, this offer had been accepted "only on the condition" that it would be referred to the people through a plebiscite as soon as the emergency had passed and peace and order had been restored.

Sheikh Abdullah's leadership and the promise of plebiscite were thus the two elements which India cited consistently to justify her acceptance of the Maharajah's accession.

On his part, Sheikh Abdullah explained that he had supported the accession to India on the explicit understanding that the people of Kashmir would be enabled, by means of a free vote in a plebiscite, either to confirm it or to denounce it and accede to Pakistan.

This was the understanding between Sheikh Abdullah and the Indian Government. Sheikh Abdullah accordingly headed the administration of India-held Kashmir. Between October, 1947, and August, 1952---the period during which the United Nations was active in negotiations about Kashmir---he appeared to take for granted that the understanding would be honored. However, as these negotiations started to flounder, he began to evince impatience and disillusionment. From August, 1952, he became increasingly emphatic in his demand that the promised plebiscite be held forthwith and that, pending the plebiscite, Kashmir be allowed to enjoy the largest autonomy. He expressed this demand in his public speeches as well as in his numerous meetings with prominent persons from abroad, notably Mr. Adlai Stevenson whom he met in June, 1953.

The result was a straining of the relations between Sheikh Abdullah and the authorities in Delhi. The situation came to a head in August, 1953. In that month, the two Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan resumed direct negotiations about all Indo-Pakistan problems, including Kashmir. Sheikh Abdullah took this opportunity publicly to demand that the pledge of plebiscite which both India and Pakistan had given to the people of Kashmir be fulfilled immediately.

The consequences were dramatic. Sheikh Abdullah was dismissed from his position as Prime Minister of Jammu and Kashmir and arrested on August 9, 1953. He was accused unofficially of conspiring with a "foreign power" to make Kashmir independent of both India and Pakistan. As proof of the accusation, his meeting with Mr. Stevenson was freely mentioned. No formal charge, however, was brought against him and no trial was held.

Sheikh Abdullah remained in jail between August 9, 1953, and January 8, 1958.

He was freed on January 8, 1958. Immediately after, he made public speeches asking again for a free and impartial plebiscite, under the auspices of the United Nations, to determine Kashmir's future. He repeated this demand in press interviews given to foreign correspondents of prominent newspapers in the United States and Britain. An exhaustive press statement, explaining the demand, was issued by him to the Indian Press on February 18, 1958.

On February 21, the Kashmir Government banned all public meetings in the Vale and confined Sheikh Abdullah's activities to his own residence. He made only one speech after that date, which was on April 21, the Muslim holy day of Id. As reported in the British and American press, it was a non-political speech, being a religious address for the occasion. "Sheikh Abdullah has preferred to lie low", the Chief Minister of the Kashmir Government told the correspondent of The Times, London, on April 25.

However, Sheikh Abdullah was arrested on April 30 and again put in jail. The official statement said that his liberty was "hazardous to the security of the State". There was no violence in the protests against his rearrest. "It seems to show that Sheikh Abdullah was a latent rather than an actual menace. But a menace he was," Kashmir's Chief Minister told the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, London, on May 1.

No formal charge was made against Sheikh Abdullah between May and October. On October 24, however, he was included in the list of accused persons in what is known as the Kashmir Conspiracy case. The defendants in this case are charged with conspiracy to foment "hatred, contempt and disaffection" against the Kashmir Government and to overthrow it "by criminal force", with the aim of "facilitating the wrongful annexation of the territory of the State" by Pakistan.

Sheikh Abdullah's co-defendants include Mirza Afzal Beg, former Revenue Minister of Kashmir, Maulana Saeed Masoodi, former Secretary General of the National Conference and member of the Indian Parliament, and officials of the Kashmir Plebiscite Front, the political party in Kashmir which demands that the United Nations Resolutions about Kashmir be implemented by India.

Dear Morris:

Thanks for your letter of October 27th.

I have just received a copy of the report from the Institute for Mediterranean Affairs, but being up to my ears with the election stuff, I haven't yet had a chance to look at it. Shall do so shortly.

As ever yours,

My dear Morris:

You are quite right. In fact, you are a rather perceptive guy. I was looking for a change of pace, following Bernard Shaw's admonition that "to become predictable is to starve". Have a look next Sunday, if you can stand it.

I hope you don't mind a report from the Ernsts anti-Trendex Company.

I think your Small World may get into trouble. The show last Sunday, -- for better or worse I don't know, -- was totally different than the prior shows. All it had in common was the mechanical techniques. I suggest that the last show looked as if you picked people rather than subjects for discussion.

My dear Ed:

As you may know, I have long been nibbling at the program of emptying the Arab Camps in the Near East. People live by symbols and as long as the camps are there, there can be no enduring peace. I have long felt that the camps could be emptied if our government would pursue secret diplomacy rather than public headlines.

I am asking the Institute for Mediterranean Affairs to send you a copy of their illuminating report, If you want to speak to Richard R. Salzmann, Director, don't hesitate to get in touch with him. You may not agree with every detail of the report but it comprises a real contribution to what I hold to be the right direction.

My dear Ed:

Harold Gardiner and I have arranged for the next dinner censorship talks at my apartment, 2 - 5th Avenue, Tuesday November 11th, around 7:30, informal. The following have already agreed to come:

Murrow
Mahoney
Gardner
Scharper
Armsey
Ernst

This letter is going out also to the following:

Father Sullivan
Hersey
Brown
Yhisaker, of Ford

I am sending to those who have not previously received same, copies of three discussions papers which I trust all may not only consider but revamp to meet their own prejudices. It has been suggested that this small group might lay plans for macadam, if not concrete steps that might be taken.

Cordially,

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

I have a trifold interest in the problem of what is broadly called censorship: I am interested as an editor, as a father of young children and as a citizen.

As a result of this triple interest I have taken advantage of almost every opportunity offered to me to participate in dialogues among men of good will. In almost every case the dialogue immediately proceeded to the stage where everyone agreed to disagree, and then the men of good will had nothing more to say. Assertion replaced argument, and cliche clanged against cliche.

Take first the question of whether or not children are harmed by the cult of violence, horror and suggestiveness in our contemporary films, TV shows and lesser newspapers.

The AMA, the American Bar Association, the National Association for Better Radio and Television and numerous other groups and responsible individuals have asserted there is probably a direct link between the rise of juvenile delinquency and the increase of brutality and sadism on the mass media.

Testimony on the other side is not lacking: reputable psychologists have asserted that far from hurting the young, such fare actually helps them by providing a psychic catharsis analogous to that which Aristotle spoke of in connection with Attic tragedy.

As a father of young children, I am concerned as to which side of the argument enjoys the greater credibility; unfortunately, there seems no way to find out, as neither side can offer much beyond grand and largely gratuitous assertions.

Closely connected with the question of the effect of violence, horror and suggestiveness upon the young is the question of what effect these same dominant themes of the image industries may have upon the adult population.

Here it is, perhaps, less a moral consideration than a cultural one -- less a question of whether the viewer is incited to action than of whether he is moved to adopt attitudes inimical to the type and level of culture which should be the fruit of our distinctly American political principles and social ethos.

If the majority, or even a sizeable segment of our population should become so blunted that they can, like Macbeth, "sup full of horror" but unlike him keep coming back for more, then millions of dollars and thousands of man hours are being wasted in our national educational effort.

In a rather typical week 223 killings were portrayed on television, along with numerous other acts of violence. Can the citizen exposed to the avalanche of such images retain that reverence for life and that sense of human dignity which we think are the hallmark of our American society, or will these values go up in Gunsmoke, Mike Hammer and Have Gun, Will Travel.

Will such a citizen suffer a withering of sensibility, until he can no longer hear the smaller noises of conscience, the more delicate nuances of wit and reason? Two otherwise disparate critics such as T. S. Eliot and John Crosby have answered "Yes" to the question. As a citizen I would fear for that minimal maturity which our democracy demands from at least a majority of its citizens if Mr. Eliot and Mr. Crosby were right. But I am not sure they are right: I am not sure, with T. S. Eliot, that "literature represents an invasion of the reader's personality, for good or evil." I am not sure, with Mr. Crosby, that "every televised shooting dulls our sensibilities just a little bit." Neither would either of these men confess themselves absolutely sure of their positions if hard pressed; they could not prove themselves right; no antagonist could prove them wrong.

And yet it is vitally important that we know whether T. S. Eliot, John Crosby and others of like views are right or wrong. As a citizen I must feel a concern for any indication of a general cultural decay, for such a decay usually presages and even prepares political malaise. But who can even give an educated guess as to whether or not the image industries are contributing to a cultural decay; the industry spokesmen simply assert that they are giving the public what it wants, and there is no hard evidence to indicate whether what the public wants is palliative or poison.

Closely connected with the question of the effect of the images of horror, violence and suggestiveness upon the audience is the question of the effect this prevailing situation has upon the serious artist, -- writer, director, producer.

If the serious artist in the mass media feels that he must conform and therefore expend his energies largely upon the question of how best to make the bodies fall or how best to get the sniggering response to sex, obviously we are frittering away much of the real talent in the entertainment arts, and are keeping some talent from entering it at all.

How does the prevailing climate of movies, TV and publishing affect the serious artist? Does it affect him at all? These are big questions but there are no big answers forthcoming. No one has asked the artists, systematically and scientifically, whether they feel, qua artists, free to contribute to our society or whether they feel that the price they must pay to enter the mass media of our society is patience, prostitution or penury.

We have, then, two authentic questions of overriding importance; we have no authoritative answers. These answers can come only from carefully conducted research. Until the results of such research are forthcoming, men of good will can carry on their dialogues with the expectation of little beyond the rehearsing of their own already well-rehearsed positions, and the exercise of civility as they regard the already familiar positions of those with whom they disagree.

Very Rough Notes

I often thought of doing a piece on the relationship of climate to the advances of civilization. I know that the highest cultures have existed in the 72° isotherm. I now find that men of deep concern and good will are most active only in bad weather. All of which is a preamble to the following, which I am sending to those present at the meeting in America. If it does not represent anyone's point of view, it might nevertheless serve as a whipping' boy for further considerations.

1. We are concerned with the lowering of the standards of taste in our culture. Although it is normal for man to feel that changing standards always mean lower standards, there is some evidence to indicate that the fiber of our culture is depreciating. The highest prestige on television goes to Jayne Mansfield's breasts, and the stories of a gun. In much of the daily press there is either the daily reporting of an orgy or the story of a boy cutting a girl's throat, and any adolescent who reads one of these tabloids will grow up to believe that it is normal to cut a throat.

2. Whenever the law sets limits it must create standards - particularly in fields of the material that goes to the mind and the emotion of man. A standard may seem clear to one person but to his neighbor concern areas as wide as the world. Moreover, the law only sets the outside limits of behavior. This group is concerned with cultural patterns and attitudes usually quite remote from criminal definitions. We are concerned with the effects on the personality of men and women.

3. We are of course in favor of a wide open market place for persuasion as to what people should read, see or hear. In the main, too much of the persuasion is in negative terms and we should imagine that our society would be benefitted if the accent were removed from the negative and the prohibited to the affirmative and recommended. We suggest that a movement in our culture in the affirmative direction should be directed toward all media - books, screen, television, radio and newspapers. The accent should be on the child and not on the adult. Hence, societal advice should flow to the parent, the teacher and others, for use with young people; and that the campaign should not be directed toward the literary, screen, television and newspaper diet of the adults themselves.

4. We believe that a movement along the above lines need not and should not be based on religious grounds and that all people of religion or no religion might well join in such a campaign of education.

5. We make no comment at this time as to the limits of persuasion and just when persuasion turns into disturbing anti-social action, whether called boycott, economic pressure or political pressure. If the societal approach is one of recommending the good rather than attacking the evil, prestige will attach to the recommended items, and the serious and dangerous impacts that often arise when attacking the evil will be removed from the campaign. Recommendation of the good has been attempted in the dissemination of ideas. See movies. We might as a group try to get a Foundation to make a study to show why such affirmative attempts have been substantially fruitless.

6. Various suggestions have been made which might appeal to several Foundations, to finance studies by social scientists. These studies could be conducted without publicity in the hope that science can make a contribution in various segments of the problem.

A. What proof if any exists as to causal relationship between pornography and human behavior. See studies of Rockefeller, Yahoda, Gluck, Wertham, Bender, etc.

B. What relationship exists, i f any, between pictorial or verbal sadism and human behavior.

C. What difference is any exists in the above areas as to the impact on men as distinguished from the impact on women.

D. What difference if any is there in the impact of fiction as compared to non-fiction, on the minds and personalities particularly of young people of either sex.

E. What are the available media of communication for the development of an affirmative program concerned primarily with adolescence in line with the above affirmative approach.

Morris L. Ernst

Nothing dramatizes so well the confusion in the matter of obscene or suggestive reading material and its effect -- or lack of effect -- especially on young people, than two items in the news recently. The August 1958 "Censorship Bulletin" of the American Book Publishers Council contains a long report by Brown University psychologists Drs. Nissim Levy, Lewis Lipsitt and Judy F. Rosenblith. Its general conclusions are that "there is no reliable evidence that reading or other fantasy activities lead to anti-social behavior."

Almost the same day, a news item stated that toward the end of October, some sociologists and psychologists, headed by Dr. Pitirim A. Sorokin, will meet in Cleveland to study the effects of the same type of reading. Since the Cincinnati Citizens for Decent Literature will sponsor the meeting, it is to be thought that this group does think that such reading is harmful, again especially to the young.

The brutal truth of the matter, as I see it, is that no one really knows. As a citizen and especially a priest, I do have knowledge that harm is done by this kind of "literature." But what is the harm, precisely -- and what is its extent. Professional psychologists and sociologists disagree. Some of them going so far as to claim that reading of suggestive material is actually a social boon, since it siphons off what might otherwise have resulted in anti-social action.

The first problem, then, that needs cryingly a comprehensive study, is the extent of external anti-social action that can be traced to this type of reading matter. To my knowledge, such a survey has never been made. We have limited studies -- to which the "Censorship Bulletin" piece refers, but there does not seem ever to have been a study that considered a good cross-section of the young people of this country.

This type of study, I feel, would be fairly simple and clear cut. But there is another at least possible effect of the reading of obscene or suggestive material, which must be suspected to exist but which will be much harder to ferret out. It is this: what happens to the mental attitudes, the thinking of young people who live on a diet of the sensational press, the lurid (if not positively obscene) magazine, pocket-size book and comic book. Is their thinking about sex, marriage and the family, respect for authority and a dozen other things warped by such a literary fare? Do marriages go on the rocks, let us say by example, because practically all that a young couple had ever read on the subject was contained in accounts of wife-beating, infidelity, drunkenness and other petty pictures drawn day after day in our tabloids? Do we know? Is there any evidence that mental attitudes are or not so shaped? It would seem a priori that a young man who is steeped in such presentations of marriage and the general relationship between the sexes must think it is quite the thing -- or at least quite normal -- to consider women as things to be used, not as persons with equal dignity. If I may digress a bit, I feel that this was one of the unfortunate effects of the famous Kinsey reports; the constant emphasis was: this is what a lot of people do, therefore it is normal. This is to prostitute the idea of a norm, which is a standard of judgment, not a quantitative tabulation.

At any rate, here is the problem as it appears to be. A two-fold study cries to be made: 1) a comprehensive examination of the possible overt anti-social acts that may be reasonably traced to this type of reading; 2) an equally wide survey of the mental attitudes, especially of the young and impressionable, and the responsibility of this type of literature for fostering these attitudes (the survey might well give some thought to considering the role of the other mass-media, -- TV, radio, etc., in arousing such attitudes.

What sort of a team of experts, under whose patronage, the techniques of the suggested surveys are all tricky matters; but as to the desirability of such ground work, I have no doubt. This is the project that I would respectfully but urgently submit to the consideration of some Foundation.

DANIEL T. O'SHEA
Vice President

Thank you for your recent letter to Mr. Stanton with respect to our program "Danger." We very much appreciate the frank expression of your views and we hope you will continue to give them to us from time to time.

The casting and staffing of the program "Danger" is the sole responsibility of the CBS Television division and not that of the sponsor, the Block Drug Company. Accordingly, your letter properly has been sent to us.

Here is how we feel about the question you have raised:

Our Management individually and our Company as such are strongly and actively opposed to communism and communists and, in fact, to any philosophy not coincident with the best interests of the United States of America, its institutions and citizens.

We will not voluntarily and with knowledge give aid, encouragement or employment to individuals or groups who espouse such causes.

We constantly are alert to the problem and, moreover, we ceaselessly are at work in our attempts to meet and solve it. We are sure you realize and agree that it is a difficult one. We think we are making progress. We know that we do not have all the answers and realize not only that mistakes have been made in the past, but, unfortunately, due to the inevitable margin of human error, some others may be made. However, no such mistake has or will originate in malice or be occasioned by carelessness.

During the course of a year the Radio and Television divisions of CBS have dealings with upwards of 250,000 artists, directors, writers and producers on network and local shows. Some of these people are employed for one performance, others for multiple performances. As you can imagine, the handling of so many people is a big and complex job.

As has been said above, we think we are making progress, in fact we are sure of it, but it would not be wise or even practical here to discuss or describe it in detail.

Quite frankly, so far as the artists in question are concerned, we do not know whether the allegations are true or not. We are giving the matter our immediate and serious attention and investigation. You can be sure we will take whatever action is dictated by the results of such investigation. Surely, no one would wish to criticize us for not taking drastic action against innocent individuals.

If you are regularly or occasionally in the CBS Television or CBS Radio audiences, you will agree, I am sure, that the programs we offer are in no sense subversive and in no sense contain subversive propaganda. This is true of the program "Danger" as it is of all of our other programs.

Be assured that we are as sincerely and deeply interested in this problem and its solution as you are.

Very truly yours,

DTO'S-rr

My dear Ed:

On the problem of privileged communication to reporters, a process I favor, keep in mind the relation of the recent court decision to Reston and the Yalta papers, the Gaither leak and the Drew Pearson original tip-off on the Adams - Goldfine mess. I am fearful that before a Congressional committee, such reporters would go to jail for contempt. I really don't care if they go to jail or not but I believe that the issue should be resolved in favor of privilege because on a risk for risk basis, the market place of reporting will be substantially cut down if the privilege is abolished.

Incidentally, take a look at Drew Pearson's new book. Irrespective of anything else he has ever done, this volume seems to me to be an important contribution which for other reasons might get short shrift in the market place of radio - television reporting.

Assertion replaced argument, and cliche clanged against cliche.

Take first the question of whether or not children are harmed by the cult of violence, horror and suggestiveness in our contemporary films, TV shows and lesser newspapers.

The AMA, the American Bar Association, the National Association for Better Radio and Television and numerous other groups and responsible individuals have asserted there is probably a direct link between the rise of juvenile delinquency and the increase of brutality and sadism on the mass media.

Testimony on the other side is not lacking: reputable psychologists have asserted that far from hurting the young, such fare actually helps them by providing a psychic catharsis analogous to that which Aristotle spoke of in connection with Attic tragedy.

As a father of young children, I am concerned as to which side of the argument enjoys the greater credibility; unfortunately, there seems no way to find out, as neither side can offer much beyond grand and largely gratuitous assertions.

Closely connected with the question of the effect of violence, horror and suggestiveness upon the young is the question of what effect these same dominent themes of the image industries may have upon the adult population.

Here it is, perhaps, less a moral consideration than a cultural one--less a question of whether the viewer is incited to action than of whether he is moved to adopt attitudes inimical to the type and level of culture which should be the fruit of our distinctly American political principles and social ethos.

If the majority, or even a sizeable segment of our population should become so blunted that they can, like Macbeth, "sup full of horror" but unlike him keep coming back for more, then millions of dollars and thousands of man hours are being wasted in our national educational effort.

In a rather typical week 223 killings were portrayed on television, along with numerous other acts of violence. Can the citizen exposed to the avalanche of such images retain that reverence for life and that sense of human dignity which we think are the hallmark of our American society, or will these values go up in Gunsmoke, Mike Hammer and Have Gun, Will Travel.

Will such a citizen suffer a withering of sensibility, until he can no longer hear the smaller noises of conscience, the more delicate nuances of wit and reason? Two otherwise disparate critics such as T. S. Eliot and John Crosby have answered "Yes" to the question.. As a citizen I would fear for that minimal maturity which our democracy demands from at least a majority of its citizens if Mr. Eliot and Mr. Crosby were right. But I am not sure they are right: I am not sure, with T. S. Eliot, that "literature represents an invasion of the reader's personality, for good or evil." I am not sure, with Mr. Crosby, that "every televised shooting dulls our sensibilities just a little bit." Neither would either of these men confess themselves absolutely sure of their positions if hard pressed; they could not prove themselves right; no antagonist could prove them wrong.

And yet it is vitally important that we know whether T. S. Eliot, John Crosby and others of like views are right or wrong. As a citizen I must feel a concern for any indication of a general cultural decay, for such a decay usually ppesages and even prepares political malaise. But who can even give an educated guess as to whether or not the image industries are contributing to a cultural decay; the industry spokesmen simply assert that they are giving the public what it wants, and there is no hard evidence to indicate whether what the public wants is palliative or poison.

Closely connected with the question of the effect of the images of horror, violence and suggestiveness upon the audience is the question of the effect this prevailing situation has upon the serious artist,--writer, director, producer.

If the serious artist in the mass media feels that he must conform and therefore expend his energies largely upon the question of how best to make the bodies fall or how best to get the sniggering response to sex, obviously we are frittering away much of the real talent in the entertainment arts, and are keeping some talent from entering it at all.

How does the prevailing climate of movies, TV and publishing affect the serious artist? Does it affect him at all? These are big questions but there are no big answers forthcoming. No one has asked the artists, systematically and scientifically, whether they feel, qua artists, free to contribute to our society or whether they feel that the price they must pay to enter the mass media of our society is patience, prostitution or penury.

We have, then, two authentic questions of overriding importance; we have no authoritative answers. These answers can come only from carefully conducted research. Until the results of such research are forthcoming, men of good will can carry on their dialogues with the expectation of little beyond the rehearsing of their own already well-rehearsed positions, and the exercise of civility as they regard the already familiar positions of those with whom they disagree.

Dear Ed:

Morris is away in Newport for the boat races, which is no doubt where all of us should be. He asked me to send you the enclosed copy of the decision in the Richter matter. I hope you don't have too much trouble deciphering it.

He also wanted me to send you a copy of the New York Times report of Congressman Porter's speech in Paris. Unfortunately, I cannot lay my hands on a copy at the moment. However, the speech was carried, in part, on page 4 of the New York Times of September 11, 1958. Porter said in effect that he is now convinced that the Galindez disappearance was engineered by Franco as well as Trujillo. (Smiles all around).

I am enclosing a copy of the letter appearing in the Times under date of September 17, 1958, written by the Spanish Press attache showing the feelings of his government to this Porter announcement.

I hope these items will interest you.

You might like to know that Morris gave an incisive and altogether magnificent talk on the present state of our obscenity laws at the recent Judicial Conference. I even think he managed to penetrate behind some complacent faces and bulging vests.

Best to you,

Sincerely yours,

STATE OF NEW YORK
DEPARTMENT OF STATE
DIVISION OF LICENSES

In the matter of the complaint of Elia J. Malara against William Richter

This complaint came on for hearing before A. S. Wechsler, Director of Licenses, Department of State, on the 1st day of July, 1958, at the New York City office of the Department of State, 270 Broadway, pursuant to a written notice duly served upon William Richter, together with a copy of the complaint as required by law.

The charges against the respondent William Richter, a lawyer and notary public, involve a certain document executed by one Virginia Wulfing on October 1, 1957, at her home in Massapequa Park, Long Island.

The respondent, with relation to his status as a notary public, and in connection with the execution of the aforesaid affidavit, is charged in the complaint as follows:

1. that Mrs. Wulfing did not appear before the respondent;

2. that Mrs. Wulfing did not sign the paper purporting to be an affidavit in the presence of respondent;

3. that the certification by the respondent on the affidavit, to wit, "sworn to before me this 1st day of October, 1957," was not correct;

4. that the respondent did not administer an oath to Mrs. Wulfing;

5. that Mrs. Wulfing did not swear to the truth of the contents of the paper purporting to be an affidavit.

The testimony and other evidence admitted at the hearing of the complaint establish the following with relation to each of the charges:

1. The charge that Mrs. Wulfing did not appear before the respondent is found to be without any basis in view of the fact that Mrs. Wulfing in her own testimony admitted that Mr. Richter was present at the time that she subscribed her signature to the document in question.

2. The second charge that Mrs. Wulfing did not sign the document in the presence of the respondent is found to be baseless in the light of the testimony by Mrs. Wulfing that she did subscribe her signature to the document in question in the presence of the respondent. In this connection, Mrs. Wulfing, in her testimony, admitted that she made certain changes in the body of the affidavit and attested to the making of such changes by inserting her initials in the margin on the level where the changes had been made.

3. On the question as to the certification by the respondent that the contents of the document had or had not been sworn to by Mrs. Wulfing, an examination of the original document placed in evidence as an exhibit indicates that the typewriting on such paper, as an entirety, was continuous and unbroken; there is not the slightest indication that the jurat, as it is typed on the original exhibit, was inserted at a later date. It is unquestionable that the imprint of type of the jurat and the remainder of the document is one and the same. The respondent, an attorney, and his witness, Francis X. Grottano, a former police lieutenant of the City of New York, both testified that the document in question, at the time it was subscribed by Mrs. Wulfing, actually contained the jurat appearing thereon. Considering the physical condition of the document together with the testimony of the witnesses, it is my finding that at the time the paper was executed by Mrs. Wulfing, it did bear the jurat.

4-5. With reference to the charges that the respondent did not administer an oath to Mrs. Wulfing, and that Mrs. Wulfing did not swear to the truth of the contents of the paper signed by her, the latter testified that she did not at any time know that the respondent was a notary public. However, she did testify that the respondent was introduced to her as an attorney.

Under the provisions of Section 137 of the Executive Law, an attorney at Law who is appointed a notary public may use in lieu of the term notary public in connection with his official acts as such, the term attorney at law.

The fact that the status of the respondent as a notary public was not made known to Mrs. Wulfing is immaterial in arriving at a disposition of the question as to whether an oath had been administered. Such an official act, as indicated, could have been performed by the respondent as an attorney, as permitted by law. In view of the deliberateness with which Mrs. Wulfing made various changes in the document in question, she initialled such changes, and corrected her name in the paper by substituting her full name for her first initial, greater credibility must be given to respondent on the question as to whether an oath had been administered. In this regard, both the respondent and his witness, Francis L. Grattano, each testified that an oath had been administered and that Mrs. Wulfing had sworn to the truth of the contents of the document in question.

Mrs. Wulfing further cast a shadow on her credibility in testifying that the words "but in April or May of that year" in paragraph 4a were added to the affidavit at a subsequent time. So serious an act is inconceivable in the light of the fact that the words "April and May 1956" appear in paragraphs "3" and "4" hence the alleged tampering with paragraph 4a was unnecessary and highly improbable.

On the basis of the findings as made above, it is hereby determined that Mrs. Wulfing did appear before the respondent William Richter on the 1st day of October, 1957; that she did sign an affidavit in his presence; that such affidavit contained a proper jurat and that such jurat was perfectly correct and regular; that the respondent did administer an oath to Mrs. Wulfing; that Mrs. Wulfing did swear to the truth of the contents of the affidavit and that the respondent did affix his official signature to the jurat on said affidavit in the presence of Mrs. Wulfing. The charges made against respondent, as a notary public, are found to be without merit. It is found that the respondent William Richter did fulfill his function as a notary public properly and completely. Accordingly, the complaint in this proceeding filed against the respondent is hereby dismissed on the merits.

Galíndez Tie Denied

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It was with great surprise that I read in the Sept. 11 issue of The New York Times that in a speech delivered in Saint Jean de Luz, France, United States Congressman Charles O. Porter, according to your paper, "asserted today that Generalissimo Franco of Spain was connected with the disappearance of Dr. Jesús de Galíndez," self-styled Basque, University of Columbia instructor who for many years resided in the Dominican Republic.

I don't believe you will find many people, no matter what political ideas they may profess, who would give credence to such a statement. Nevertheless, it might still be useful to recall:

That in spite of the time elapsed since Dr. Galíndez' disappearance, two and a half years ago, and of the investigations conducted by the United States Department of Justice, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Police Department and by a group of private attorneys at no time has the name of a single Spanish Government agent been connected with this case.

That the Spanish Chief of State is the head of a friendly nation and an ally of the United States, and that therefore not even political passion—legitimate and respectable in fair play—should justify such a preposterous accusation.

Statements of such nature follow exactly the technique used by the Communists when they cut loose, throwing insult after insult of the same ignominious sort against the American boys who—without firing a shot—oppose their devious plans in the Middle East and Asia.

6. Enclosed find copies of two preliminary statements resulting from our dinner parties of the spring.

(x) I mean - could suggest some one more skilled in form of conversation

I find in a volume entitled MEMOIR OF JOSIAH QUINCY, 1744-1775, by his son, Josiah Quincy, published in Boston by John Wilson and Son, 1874, an amusing story. As a foreword, may I say that with the advent of mass media, men and women in our culture can be destroyed as easily by the press, radio and television, as by any magistrate sitting in any court. One only has to recall the injury done, not in a court, not even in a hearing room, but merely by statements made by men like Senator McCarthy. This, even though the statements are short of libel. Moreover, the court, as a forum, in most libel injuries, is quite inadequate for redress since the press is in unison in failing to report libel actions.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Josiah Quincy, Junior, was an ardent Republican and hater of British tyranny. According to the foreword of the book he was of the same ilk as Adams, Otis, Hancock and Warren, and was of great help in the establishment of the American Republic. In addition, his activities, indirectly at least, helped incite events leading to the Boston Massacre.

In 1770 Quincy was asked to defend the British soldiers who had participated in the massacre, and most particularly, a Captain Preston, who was in command. Although Quincy had long been opposed to British rule and certainly to British tyranny, and although the people were crazed with hate for the British atrocities, Quincy decided to accept the defense along with John Adams. Quincy was made the brunt of a violent, brutal and salacious attack by the public.

As a result, Quincy's father, Josiah Quincy by name, wrote to his son on March 22, 1770 (p. 26 of the MEMOIR). Part of this letter follows:

"My dear son,

I am under great affliction at hearing the bitterest reproaches uttered against you, for becoming an advocate for those criminals who are charged with the murder of their fellow citizens. Good God! Is it possible? I will not believe it . . .

I must own to you that it has filled the bosom of your aged and infirm parent with anxiety and distress, lest it should not only prove true, but destructive of your reputation and interest; and I repeat, I will not believe it, unless it be confirmed by your own mouth, or under your own hand.

Your anxious and distressed parent,

Josiah Quincy"

Josiah Quincy, Junior, replied to his father in the classic letter which follows (p. 27 of the MEMOIR):

"Honoured Sir:

I have little leisure, and less inclination, either to know or to take notice of those ignorant slanderers who have dared to utter their 'bitter reproaches' in your hearing against me, for having become an advocate for criminals charged with murder. But the sting of reproach, when envenomed only by envy and falsehood, will never prove mortal. Before pouring their reproaches into the ear of the aged and infirm, if they had been friends, they would have surely spared a little reflection on the nature of an attorney's oath and duties; - some trifling scrutiny into the business and discharge of his office, and some small portion of patience in viewing my past and future conduct.

Let such be told, Sir, that these criminals, charged with murder are not yet legally proved guilty, and therefore, however criminal, are entitled, by the laws of God and Man, to all legal counsel and aid; that my duty as a man obliged me to undertake; that my duty as a lawyer strengthened the obligation; that from abundant caution, I at first declined being engaged; that after the best advice, and most mature deliberation had determined my judgment, I waited on Captain Preston and told him that I would afford him my assistance; but, prior to this, in presence of two of his friends I made the most explicit declaration to him of my real opinion on the contests (as I expressed it to him) of the times, and that my heart and hand were indissolubly attached to the cause of my country; and finally that I refused all engagement, until advised and urged to undertake it, by an Adams, a Hancock, a Molineux, a Cushing, a Henshaw, a Pemberton, a Warren, a Cooper and a Phillips. This and much more might be told with great truth; and I dare affirm that you and this whole people will one day REJOICE that I became an advocate for the aforesaid 'criminals' charged with the murder of our fellow-citizens.

I never harboured the expectation nor any great desire that all men should speak well of me. To inquire my duty, and to do it, is my aim. Being mortal, I am subject to error; and, conscious of this, I wish to be diffident. Being a rational creature, I judge for myself according to the light afforded me. When a plan of conduct is formed with an honest deliberation, neither murmuring, slander, nor reproaches move. For my single self, I consider, judge, and with reason hope to be immutable.

There are honest men in all sects, - I wish their approbation; - there are wicked bigots in all parties, - I abhor them.

I am, truly and affectionately, your Son,

Josiah Quincy, Jr."

Quincy tried the case along with John Adams in October of 1770. The defendants were acquitted. Adams, writing in 1822, had this to say about the public reaction to his and Quincy's representation:

"At the present day it is impossible to realize the excitement of the populace, and the abuse heaped upon Mr. Quincy and myself for our defense of the British Captain and his soldiers; we heard our names execrated in the most opprobrious terms whenever we appeared in the streets of Boston."

"LIFE" DENIES ERNST REPORT DISPROVES ITS THEORY OF GALINDEZ DISAPPEARANCE; DARES DOMINICANS TO SUE FOR LIBEL

NEW YORK, June 1 -- The report by lawyers Morris Ernst and William Munson, released today, has contributed nothing substantial to refute the theory, reported in the February 25, 1957 issue of LIFE Magazine, that Dr. Jesus de Galindez was kidnapped by agents of Dominican Dictator Trujillo and was flown from Long Island to the Dominican Republic, via Florida, by Gerald Murphy, a free-lance American flyer. According to this week's issue of LIFE Magazine, the Ernst-Munson investigation does not alter the record as to Murphy's flight or explain away the coincidence of the Galindez disappearance on the same night that Murphy, after weeks of preparation and after working with a convicted agent of the Dominican Republic, headed on a long flight southward.

The magazine notes that the Ernst-Munson paper attempts to retrace LIFE's investigation. "It delves into every step minutely, but the result never disproves LIFE's story. In many ways it substantiates it." LIFE says that if the allegations of its theory were unjust "as hinted and not proved by the Ernst report," Espaillat and Trujillo are welcome to come to the U.S. and sue for libel.

In support of its position the magazine quotes Congressman Charles O. Porter of Oregon, a prime mover behind the Washington investigation into the Murphy-Galindez case: "The report changes nothing basic in the known record of Murphy's part in the Galindez disappearance. The United States Government -- the Department of Justice, the Department of State and other agencies -- know these basic facts. And the Dominican Espaillat, for whom Ernst is trying to provide an alibi, is so deeply involved in these basics that he is afraid to come to the U.S. and testify or cooperate -- even though he has been asked twice formally and many times informally by this government."

LIFE observes that the Ernst-Munson report was prepared at vast expense over many months with "its main purpose" to refute LIFE's 1957 story -- the first to link the Galindez disappearance with the disappearance and death of U.S. pilot Gerald Murphy.

The basic point in the Ernst-Munson claim, according to the magazine, hinges on timing. They say that the gas capacity of Murphy's plane, cruising speed and available time made it improbable that the trip to the Dominican Republic could be made within the known timetable. LIFE, using the same statistics, holds that the flight would have been possible.

Since publication of its original story, the magazine also says, new facts have turned up supporting their theory of the Galindez disappearance. The man who accepted $800 from Murphy for the rental of the airplane said that Murphy wanted the receipt made out in the name of "John Kane", an alias for John Frank. The grand jury investigating the Galindez case later indicted Frank for failing to register as an agent of the Dominican Republic. He has since been convicted on this charge.

A young man named Harold French, a friend of Murphy's, has said that it was he who installed the extra gas tanks in Murphy's plane. He said that one of the men present at the airport when the plane was rented was Espaillat. The Ernst-Munson report says that the records fail to show that Espaillat was in the U.S. during that period. Now in the Dominican Republic, Espaillat has refused to come to this country and testify.

COSTLY WHITEWASH OF BLACK CHARGES

After 10 months Lawyer Ernst criticizes LIFE on Galíndez but the big question remains unanswered

THIS is a story that will never really end—in spite of a pretentious document released to the press this week. The paper was prepared at vast expense (well over $100,000), and over many months, with its main purpose to refute a story that appeared, more than a year ago, in LIFE.

The story is one of the officially unsolved disappearance of a frightened, bitter man, Jesús María de Galíndez, and the presumed death of a young American flyer named Gerald Lester Murphy in shark-filled Caribbean waters in the year 1956. The document that now brings it back into the news again is a sort of rambling white paper, 95 pages long with 176 pages of exhibits. It was prepared under the aegis of Lawyer Morris Ernst. A well-known liberal, Ernst was hired last July by Dominican Dictator Rafael Trujillo (through New York publicist Sydney Baron) to investigate press charges that the Dominican government had something to do with Galíndez' disappearance. His paper, entitled "Report and Opinion in the Matter of Galíndez," is not an official document—the Galíndez-Murphy case is still under grand jury investigation. It is the record of a 10-month-long examination by Ernst and his staff of the evidence on which the charges were based, and it turned out to be an obvious attempt to get Trujillo off the hook.

Galíndez, a leader of the Basque government in exile, a teacher at Columbia University and a bitter foe of Trujillo, disappeared mysteriously after one of his classes on the night of March 12, 1956. Knowing his fear of Trujillo's agents in New York, his friends cried foul play. The police investigated but found no answer. Stories began to circulate. It was widely suggested for a while that his body had been stuffed into the flaming boilers of a Dominican ship then tied up in New York harbor.

The first big break in the case came almost a year later when LIFE, after a thorough investigation of its own, published the Galíndez story. As LIFE reconstructed the story in its issue of Feb. 25, 1957, Galíndez was kidnaped shortly after leaving a class at 9:30 p.m., probably at the entrance to a New York subway station. He was put into an ambulance and driven to Amityville, Long Island. There he was placed in a twin-engined Beechcraft airplane N68100, fitted with extra gas tanks. From Amityville he was flown to Miami's Tamiami Airport. The plane arrived too early to gas and flew to Lantana Airport near West Palm Beach, gassed up ($95 plus a $15 tip) and flew to the Dominican Republic.

LIFE's story had another side to it. The pilot of the plane was Gerald Lester Murphy, a young man with bad eyesight who would do almost anything to fly. Murphy had done all he could to get an airlines job, but had wound up flying for Tom Guthrie's air taxi service at Miami. In Miami he met Arturo Espaillat, the Dominican Republic's New York consul general (who was to emerge as a shadowy figure in the case). Soon Murphy told Guthrie he had a better job. He went to Linden, N.J. and rented a twin-engine Beechcraft for a month—for $800 cash. In the middle of March, Murphy was back at Guthrie's with his Beech and a lot of money. He bought a convertible—and he talked. He said he had flown a wealthy invalid to Tampa and that a charter flight passenger had fixed him up with a flying job in the Dominican Republic's national airline. He went to Ciudad Trujillo and flew for several months, writing home about all the money he was making. He wrote he was coming home. Then in December he put an ad in a Dominican paper offering his household goods for sale. Next day his car was found, deserted, near a cliff by a bay. A Dominican pilot who had flown with him, Octavio de la Maza, was charged with Murphy's murder, denied everything to the police, then admitted the murder in a suicide note and hanged himself in his cell. That was the end of Murphy, and—as far as the public knows—of Galíndez too. It seemed to be the end of the trail. These were some of the facts that LIFE, with its best resources, had gathered a year ago last February.

Now, 15 months later, the Ernst report has attempted to retrace LIFE's investigation—minute by minute, mile by mile. It delves into every step minutely, but the results never disprove LIFE's story. In many ways, the paper substantiates it. The report does not admit that Galíndez was in Murphy's plane. It clings to the fact that the New York police still list Galíndez as missing, rather than as a victim of foul play. It does not agree that Murphy even flew to the Dominican Republic. Instead it comes to the conclusion that he probably flew to Cuba where, the report implies, he was engaged in some unnamed illegal activity.

The basic point: timing

THE basic point in the Ernst report's conclusion hinges on timing. His claim: the N68100's gas capacity, cruising speed and the time available made it improbable for the plane to have made the trip to the Dominican Republic within the established timetable. To fit both Ernst's and LIFE's timetable, Murphy could only have made his Dominican flight on March 13. LIFE said that Murphy went first to Tamiami, then Lantana, then left the United States. Ernst says that the airport records were in error, and that Murphy went first to Lantana, took off about 8 a.m. and landed at Tamiami at 3 that afternoon. Thus, if he flew to Montecristi field in the Dominican Republic (as later reports indicate), Murphy would have had about seven hours for a round trip that takes seven hours flying, allowing no time at all for landing, unloading or refueling.

Thus, Ernst's 3 o'clock landing time became a critical factor. If Murphy had landed at 5 instead of 3, says Ernst, "it would have been possible, but extremely improbable, for him to have made the trip." But last Saturday night, Ernst's own source, Sidney Stein, co-owner of Blue Star Aviation Corporation at Tamiami Airport, told LIFE: "I realize that I made an error, that Murphy had come in at 4:30 or 5:00 p.m." Hence, even if Murphy did not take off until 8—even if, as Ernst says, he went to Lantana first—the flight would still have been "possible."

Whitewash CONTINUED

Ernst found "not a scintilla of evidence" to connect Galíndez with Murphy and N68100. But LIFE's story has been supported since its publication by new facts and coincidences. The man who accepted Murphy's $800 for the rental of N68100 said that Murphy wanted the receipt made out to one John Kane (an alias for John Joseph Frank). On May 13, 1957 the grand jury investigating Galíndez disappearance indicted Frank for failure to register as a Dominican agent. He was convicted Dec. 9. At the Frank trial a young man named Harold French, a friend of Murphy's, testified that it was he who helped Murphy ready his plane for flight. He said that one of the men he met with Murphy at Linden airport where the plane was rented was the everpresent Espaillat. The Ernst report says that records fail to show that Espaillat was in the U.S. during that period. Now safe in the Dominican Republic, Espaillat has refused to come to the U.S. and testify.

Harold French told LIFE that he helped Murphy put extra gas tanks in the plane and that Murphy had talked about a mysterious flight. "Gerry laid out some charts on his bed at Rahway Motel Tourist Village, folding them so they fit together. 'Here's one of the trips I might make,' he said. 'I will be taking somebody from Miami to the Dominican Republic. Let's see how it would look on the chart.'

"We studied the charts for two hours. Gerry said the flight would end at a specific airport on the Dominican north coast, Montecristi."

The report characterized Gerry Murphy as an irresponsible young braggart who lived on sporadic payments from unknown sources, Galíndez as a cynic who raised funds for the Basque cause; and implied skulduggery. The report sloughs over stories of the kidnaping told by Murphy to Sally Caire, then his fiancée, now married and living in Kansas. Her account was one of the strongest links between the young pilot and Galíndez.

Thus, as facts pile up, the arguments go on. Ernst has not explained the key coincidence. A foe of Trujillo disappears in New York at 9:30 p.m. At just about the time he would have arrived at Amityville, a young American pilot, after weeks of involved preparation, after working with a now convicted agent of the Dominican government, suddenly takes off on a long, midnight flight—to points south.

This week, when the Ernst report was released, Congressman Charles O. Porter of Eugene, Ore., Murphy's home town, who was a prime mover behind the Washington investigation into the Murphy-Galíndez case, said, "The report changes nothing basic in the known record of Murphy's part in the Galíndez disappearance. The United States government—the Department of Justice, the Department of State and other agencies—know these basic facts. And the Dominican Espaillat, for whom Ernst is trying to provide an alibi, is so deeply involved in these basics that he is afraid to come to the U.S. and testify or cooperate—even though he has been asked twice formally and many times informally by this government."

Recently Morris Ernst wrote a letter to Sydney Baron. In it Ernst pointed out that, although "much of the press, radio and television made statements which were libelous vis-à-vis the Dominican Republic," it was impossible, according to his interpretation of U.S. libel laws, for a foreign government to sue. This, however, does not apply to private persons such as Espaillat or even Trujillo himself. If Espaillat and Trujillo believe the allegations are unjust—as hinted and not proved by the Ernst report—they can come to the U.S., and under the laws sue various TV, radio and press groups, including LIFE, for libel. It's up to them.

"MY FRIEND" was the way Gerry Murphy described Dominican diplomat Espaillat in this magazine photograph which he mailed home to his parents.

My dear Ed:

I wonder if you could join us for dinner at 7:30 on the evening of April 17th.

I am sending you under separate cover a copy of Harold Gardner's book "Catholic Viewpoint on Censorship". I reviewed this volume for the Saturday Review and concluded that this was the most important book on censorship over the last decades, not that I agree even in the main with the author's positions but because I am persuaded that he is a man of goodwill and he has opened up new pipelines of communication in our culture. I have been disturbed, as you know, because of what I felt was an increasing amount of anti-Catholic bigotry in our culture. I thought we might run a series of informal dinner parties with people who can differ with goodwill.

Let me know soon if you cannot come to this informal party. This, so that I can invite someone in your place since we want to keep the group small. This is the first party and I have invited:

EILEEN DARBY/GRAPHIC HOUSE

It's important to teach a child to read, says Miss Jean Listebarger, but it's more important to make him want to read

McCALL'S TEACHER OF THE YEAR

Parents of children in Miss Jean Listebarger's second grade at the Edwards School in Ames, Iowa, are never at a loss to know what goes on in class. Several times a year, at evening meetings with mothers and fathers, she explains her program — and at the same time gives them the opportunity to ask questions about the school's philosophy and methods.

Miss Listebarger, McCall's National Teacher of the Year for 1958, employs other interesting techniques. For example, she teaches Spanish to the twenty-seven members of her class. She works closely with each child's family to help develop special talents. In the same classroom she is able to challenge her superior students with more assignments while she is encouraging and working overtime with those who are more backward — often with startlingly successful results. Never in her second grade are there "forgotten" children.

Each of the meetings with parents is devoted to a different phase of the second-grade program. Generally, the first is devoted to language arts, and Miss Listebarger says, "I try to help parents understand that children grow and develop at different rates, that reading is more than merely word calling. Parents who are tense about a child's reading ability begin to relax when they hear about our second-grade phonics program."

At a second meeting parents actually participate in a number game played by their children. This time they are (Continued on page 60)

"Timely and Important..."

DR. MILTON J. E. SENN

It is timely and important that McCall's is honoring an elementary-school teacher as National Teacher of the Year.

Timely because since Sputnik there has been much talk about the deficiencies of our educational system and the need to improve it at high-school and college levels, especially in the teaching of science.

It is important because the significance of elementary-school education has been little emphasized in these days of American self-examination. Education in the early years sets the stage for later learning or lack of learning.

Children of primary-grade age, and even before, have an abundance of curiosity, a drive to investigate everything, to question and to criticize. They even want direction and discipline. Their powers of perception match those of the adult scientist. They lack only his mature self-discipline and ability to plan his research in an orderly manner and to appraise results in terms of relatedness to other knowledge.

In other words, the young child is motivated naturally to learn and to be taught, has the emotional and intellectual potentials for developing qualities of independence and critical thinking which we want our citizens to have. If by high-school age children become passive and conforming, the fault lies in those of us who as parents and educators have been blind to our opportunities for keeping interest in learning alive, and have misjudged the importance of our role in rearing and educating young children.

shown the value of developing number concepts and understandings as a basis for more abstract number thinking. At a third meeting Miss Listebarger suggests solutions to such complex problems as comic books, regulation of television viewing, the amount of responsibility a second grader should be able to accept at home.

Again and again she has found that mothers and fathers become more patient about their child's progress as a result of these meetings. Parents and teacher learn to become co-workers in enriching the lives of their seven-year-olds.

Each parent is furnished a booklet —written and typed by Miss Listebarger and decorated by the children—describing characteristics unique among second graders, outlining her program of studies, her goals and the ways in which she plans to achieve them.

The booklet underlines Miss Listebarger's ruling conviction: Children will read if they learn to want to read. Second grade, she points out, is the critical time in reading—this is when a child decides whether it is fun or a bore. Clues are listed for parents to watch in evaluating a youngster's growing skill.

The second-grade arithmetic program calls for understanding numbers up to two hundred and a concept of hundreds, tens and ones; addition with sums of ten or less; subtraction of combinations with an answer of ten or less; the initial use of fractions; measurements of time and money, weights and lengths. Her class, she says, does simple story problems involving addition and subtraction, and often masters numbers through games.

In her language program Miss Listebarger wants her pupils to become adept at reporting facts that add to the information of the group, and to develop good listening habits as well.

After a trip to the fire station or the post office the boys and girls write their reactions—and in the process improve their spelling and their sentence structure. As the year goes on some of the second graders will begin to organize their thinking into paragraphs concerned with one central thought. The last fire-station trip, incidentally, also inspired two murals made by six boys and girls, who were thus provided an opportunity to express themselves and also to plan and work together. New words too—such as ax, ladder, boots, siren, helmet—were adapted from the trip to the spelling lesson.

Miss Listebarger makes periodic walks through the woods a normal part of the curriculum. For days afterward the boys and girls study the specimens they bring back, review the trip in prepared talks, make drawings that tell the story of what they have seen, and even write accounts of something unusual that might have happened or been observed.

Great stress is placed on science, for as Miss Listebarger explains to the parents, it is natural for young children to be inquisitive. Everything in their world is new and fresh and wonderful, and therefore at their age they are most receptive to the facts of science. Her children begin building an orderly understanding of the world around them: how seeds are distributed and take root, the place of water and light in our lives, the classification of animals, the relation of temperature to weather and of weather to our daily lives. Young scientists of the future have been vastly encouraged in this class.

Miss Listebarger is one of a very few elementary teachers in Iowa who teach Spanish.

"I believe that a foreign language should be taught at an early age," she says, "because during these years children are imitative and unself-conscious and can pick up languages quickly. If they learn to love a language when they are young, the chances are that they will want to continue in high school or college."

Her technique in teaching elementary Spanish is purely conversational. Spanish words are introduced through the use of pictures, objects and context, as well as through songs, games and dramatizations. These adventures in Spanish usually occur at the beginning of the school day and are considered as much a part of the day's work as spelling or arithmetic.

The pupils remember their Spanish, too. "Our fourth grader is still talking Spanish to us," says one parent. Another says, "Mary's curiosity about foreign languages apparently will not be satisfied now until she has studied them in high school and college." Several students have continued their interest after second grade by taking private Spanish lessons.

Certainly the fine school system at Ames is in part responsible for Miss Listebarger's success. The Edwards School is a source of community pride, with its roomy, airy classrooms, well equipped for today's new methods and demands. Counter space, bookcases on wheels and a woodworking bench, for example, provide space to study specimens, display collections, dramatize stories, read in small groups, paint and draw. The room is attractive, with healthy green plants, gaily bound books and exhibits of the children's own handicraft. What E. C. Aurand, the principal of Edwards, calls a "permissively controlled atmosphere" pervades this room.

A native of Fairfax, Iowa, Miss Listebarger graduated from Cornell College in Mount Vernon, Iowa, in 1951, the year she started teaching. In addition to her schoolwork, she is actively interested in various Methodist youth movements. She is eager to earn a master's degree, and the chances are that she will soon take a year's leave of absence from teaching if she can arrange a scholarship.

It is difficult to decide whether Miss Listebarger is most popular with her second graders, their parents or the educational leaders in Ames. The parents, for example, tell about listless students who suddenly have become interested in their work, of slow learners who have adjusted, of seven-year-olds who have unexpectedly become eager readers, of youngsters who have discovered a passion for science in her class. Her pupils, the parents report, have a desire to know more about current events and people in other lands.

The children love their school and find that work there is fun. Discipline rarely seems to be a problem; it is supplanted by an understanding of how people live together, of fair play and recognition of the rules of good conduct. One former pupil recently expressed appreciation of her teacher this way: "She showed me how to earn good grades."

For their part, educators in Ames are gratified by Miss Listebarger's ability to organize her work, her faultless planning and her great skill. She has a facility, Superintendent of Schools Walter L. Hetzell points out, for improving each child in the class, for making each pupil realize that she is interested in him. "She leaves no stone unturned," he adds, "to provide lessons which will help both the superior child and the slow learner."

James F. Kee, supervisor of special education services and school psychologist in Ames, recalls the case of Sam, a markedly overstimulated and hyperactive boy. Sam's generalized confusion resulted in almost no achievement for him and near exhaustion for his teacher. "My alternatives were to drop the boy from school or locate an unusually gifted teacher for him," says Mr. Kee. "We thought of Miss Listebarger, and Sam was transferred to her classroom. She worked with him for thirteen months, during which time there was a remarkable transformation in him from chaotic confusion to relative stability.

"Miss Listebarger knows how to work not only with children like Sam but with all children. She possesses a rare insight into the emotional needs of children, and under her skillful management they acquire an unmistakable inner contentment and calmness which contribute importantly to their success in the classroom." THE END

McCall's HONOR ROLL OF TEACHERS

These teachers earned special mention in 1958 for their significant contributions to the improvement of national teaching standards:

Miss Sophia D. Chrusciel, second-grade teacher, Northeast Elementary School, Rutland, Vermont. Her radiant enthusiasm inspires seven- and eight-year-olds to want to do their best. Her superior understanding and able guidance help the "different" child to become a happy, participating member of the class.

Miss Lillye D. Harding, librarian, Gulfport High School, Gulfport, Mississippi. She makes the library a convergent area for the whole school. She compiles reference materials with wisdom, imagination and orderly method; orients students in intelligent use of library resources; and generates enthusiasm for reading and research.

Miss Helen M. Hogan, head of the social studies department, Leavenworth High School, Waterbury, Connecticut. Her teaching aims to serve students of economics and American history in terms of their vocational needs, and to engender attitudes of loyal, effective citizenship. Her wholehearted, competent leadership in professional and civic affairs points toward betterment of both school and community.

Mrs. Betty Lou Pagel, coordinator of elementary grades, Cheyenne, Wyoming. Through her intelligent curriculum planning, her demonstration teaching and her teaching workshops, she has opened new and valuable vistas in education to students, parents and her fellow teachers.

Miss Mary C. Rogers, teacher of science and mathematics, Thompson Junior High School, Newport, Rhode Island. She succeeds in keeping her science and mathematics classes up-to-date by participating each summer in scientific institutes, nuclear studies and laboratory experiments provided by education, government and industry.

Mrs. Edna Saunders Tait, mathematics teacher and student council adviser, Leon High School, Tallahassee, Florida. Her main problem in the classroom is getting students to enjoy mathematics, and she succeeds in this by turning her classes into "learning laboratories." She guides and leads the student council with immense skill.

Mr. Glenn R. Ziegler, teacher of vocational agriculture, Mount Baker High School, Deming, Washington. He has trained more outstanding farmers than any other teacher in his state, and he has the awards to prove it. Stimulating and inventive, he has instilled among his students a new sense of cooperation, leadership and community service.

Miss Dorothy E. Zimmerman, general science teacher, Roosevelt Junior High School, Salt Lake City, Utah. In 1956 she was cited as Woman of the Year in Education in Utah for her special talent in arousing scientific interest among her students. Lately she has influenced an increasing number of girls to take up science. Her classes are surprisingly well informed about atomic energy, radar, and space travel.

How we found McCall's National Teacher of the Year

Miss Listebarger was selected by McCall's from teachers nominated by state departments of education in all parts of the nation at the invitation of Dr. Lawrence G. Derthick, United States Commissioner of Education, and Dr. Edgar Fuller, Executive Secretary of the Council of Chief State School Officers. Representatives approved by the U. S. Office of Education and McCall's studied and observed the nominees at work over a period of several months. From their recommendations the editors selected Miss Listebarger, who earns the seventh citation in McCall's annual project honoring teachers.

Dear Ed:

I am leaving for the West Coast on Monday, March 3rd. Note the additional items on my television program.

1. As a symbol, maybe the honorarium paid to the subject should be $250 or even nothing. To the teacher we ought to pay $750 or $1000. The differential validates the spirit of the program.

2. I ran into the I T & T publicity staff. They are deluged by "The Philadelphia Story". Why shouldn't we let I T & T buy the new program particularly if we pick up teachers from other cultures.

3. I sent a copy of the working papers to Hobe Lewis at Reader's Digest. I think that kind of sponsor might be interested in putting the program on film for its free distribution to schools and colleges.

4. What about my idea of working out a deal with Herbert Agar who controls one of the British sponsored television areas. They won't pay enough to work out a weekly alternate exchange but we might be able to pick up a British counterpart interview of someone well known to the American public.

I have lots more information that I have not bothered to pour on to you.

Although I have given the package to my kids, they will be happy, if it will not embarrass you, to cut in Casey so that he would have a fourth part. My only hesitance on such a proposal would arise from public embarrassment of your relations to the program and your employer. Of course it could not be done without disclosure and maybe disclosure would evaporate my hesitance.

Yours,

Dear Ed:

Enclosed find working papers for the program of which the owners will be my kids. Without any reference to a television program I have conducted another thirty interviews. I am also sending you a budget which I have prepared based on several other analogous programs, the names of which I cannot reveal.

I hope the paradoxical winter vacation will not upset you for the rest of the season. In any event, I am more sure of my idea than ever, and will keep my calendar free for you and Bill.

Average Cost of Three Comparative Half Hour Shows

Package

Accounting	$ 50.00
Misc.	300.00
Production	500.00
Writing	350.00
Afra	135.00
Material research	50.00
Office with 2 secretaries	225.00
Insurance	150.00
Interviewer	500.00
Head Man	200.00
Legal	125.00
Taxes, not income	275.00
Plus commissions of agent, if any, honorarium, misc.	1,140.00
For originator and owners in lieu of agent,	1,500.00
	5,500.00
Network charges	3,000.00 (*)
	8,500.00

(*) This includes auditing, telephone, telegraph, studio crew, director, which is minimal, office space, etc.

On the excess the packager would normally get a 50 - 50 split. There are special services at times to integrate commercials, etc. There exists the variable factors -- time of day, the frequency of performance, a definite committment for 13 weeks, number of outlets, etc. which effect total cost to sponsor.

P.S. I'd like to try it out at Morgan's with Harry Davison, Leffingwell, et al, whenever you and Bill give a green light.

Theatre: Hayes, Cornell, Olivier, Fonda
Directors: Stevens, Kazan
Publishers: Sulzberger, Fisher (Harpers) Harry Luce and Clare
Inventors: Sandford
Humorists: Perelman, Thurber

Requirements of Interviewer:

1. Not too glamorous - will overwhelm subject.

2. Rounded as to science, art, psychology, literature - a cultured man interested in people

3. Suggestions - Massey, Murrow, Mark VanDoren, MacLeish. Why not try out even unfamous gents?

4. Ability to explore all facets of the subject and not just the one for which he is famous.

5. Wise enough to know that the flame once sparked is fanned later in life.

6. At times have two people interview one subject.

7. Possibly have a group of interviewers to be used alternately.

8. Explore what success or fame did to the subject. Did teacher know what he was doing? Did subject thank teacher?

9. Kick-off programs: E.R.M. interview M.L.E. and visa-versa

Format:

1. No scenery and no motion, except in rare case to see a painting or a bit of sculpture of the subject.

2. Scientist could redo the first experiment.

3. No one will refuse

4. Pick up foreigners who visit here to get impact of education elsewhere.

5. Do you use a table with stiff chairs or easy chairs like Dr. Pike?

6. Possibility of use of picture of subject at age when sparked and picture if possible of teacher or even of classmates.

7. Teacher and subject together, but this is only likely if subject is under 50.

8. Spread of locations - not all culture is in big cities.

9. No deal on publishing rights until I have fulfilled my commitment to talk to Reader's Digest.

10. Put on film and use in schools in 16 mm.

11. No honorarium is needed, but if any it should be modest.

The Spark:

1. Discuss the school, the size, maybe the budget, the number in the class, the equipment, the teacher, male or female.

2. Discuss the teacher, not only as to the age but as to future effectiveness.

3. Get to specific poem, book, experiment (See Murrow re Marcus Aurelius, Marglo Gilmore re Proust, Billy Graham re priest).

4. What happened to teacher and subject's relation to teacher. (See MLE re Ted Lewis and Ed Williams re inaugeration story).

5. Did subject thank teacher? If not, why not, and if so, under what circumstances? (See story of Taylor whose sparker, Alexander, worked for Taylor later because he did not want Taylor to fail in Germany).

6. Were other pupils affected?

7. Surprise as to name of subject is a possibility.

8. Teachers may be inarticulate, but this can be capitalized on. The spark comes often from those who are not orators.

9. Did subject do anything to further education.

10. Public schools vs. private schools as sources of inspiration.

11. Assessment of methods, 20 - 30 years ago - changes, if any, since.

Things to Look for in Relation to the Spark:

1. Size of family and where the subject lived and age when it struck.

2. Income status - hungry, poor or rich.

3. Parents, sisters, brothers, older or younger.

4. Athletics and hobbies. Relationship to other children and loneliness.

5. Timid or brash, secure or insecure then and now - major insecurity.

6. Relation at the time to other sex, to fantasy reading, to fiction and nonfiction, to detective story reading - See Woodrow Wilson.

7. Early dreams - policeman, fireman, nurse.

8. Movie influence - paper, magazines.

9. Prior reading or knowledge in field of spark.

10. Intra-class competition at the time - average subject in a bright class or stood-out in an average one.

11. See records kept by school at time - see Charles Van Doren records at C & C school!

Subtle Results of Spark to be Sought:

1. Creation of curiosity.
2. Open new vistas.
3. Goal of perfection.
4. Value of work habits.
5. Personal satisfaction as compared to societal admiration.
6. Motive of public good as compared to getting the answer to a problem.
7. Relation of spark in later years to adjustment to family and society.

Undisclosed but "liminal" purpose - to give teachers and men of the mind a prestige category just below the high prestige of Jayne Mansfield's breasts -- wherever that may be! The secret weapon is to get respect for education and hence better schools -- desireable even if there were no SPUTNIK or Russia.

The Marian Anderson show was as good as you said it would be. As to your Round Up, only one person mentioned that dirty word -- Dulles. It is about time you put somebody into Central and South America. It is only a matter of a few years before the communists will capture one of those illiterate nations, at which time our people will be more panicky than they were over Syria.

Out of your 24 hours each day if you would only let me have 27 or 28 hours, I am sure we could really make a dent on the fundamentals of the television - radio problems. Dear Morris:

Thanks so much for your good letter and for bringing Mr. Murrow down here. We were privileged to meet him and have luncheon with him. I did thoroughly enjoy the visit. I will pass on your letter to Harry and see what he thinks about it.

I agree with you about the egalitarian methods of the unions. Of course it is the unskilled who have the most votes and to whom the leaders therefore cater. Our system of taxation is similarly a egalitarian and operates to the discouragement of effort in professional, educational and other fields. Again those who have the most votes are the favorites of legislation.

Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

My dear Russell:

Edward Murrow and I will be down at your shop at 12:45 on December 5th. With our comparatively lagging educational attitudes, I should think that money alone can do little unless prestige values for the mind be created in the mores of our people. Ed owns one of the most important pipelines to the people of our nation. I hope he will be willing to be frank enough to tell you the competition, in prestige terms, between scholarship and Things of the spirit as compared to symbols such as the G-man gun and portions of the bodies of Hollywood glamour girls.

If you have one or two other associates in addition to Henry in the small room, I would suggest that the conversation would flow better than at the big table. Ed's talks with me led me to believe that in part a shift of prestige for scholarship may well have to seep down from the top of our culture -- as what doesn't and shouldn't -- and rightly or wrongly, I believe that you and your confreres are the top.

Don't scold me.

Notes on TV show dealing with Jury System

1. There are two systems. In [illegible] cannot pick a jury where some juror is not related to a witness, a party or a lawyer -- in the big cities, if a juror has heard of the case he is apt to be challenged.

2. There are the types of people, varying from state to state who are exempted from jury duty.

3. Stories which used to make it seem that everybody wants to get on the jury. [illegible] juries, and note that a [illegible] year.

October 24, 1957

Dear Ed:

As your fewer goes down, you might want to mull over some of the tidbit I have listed in regard to juries. I have no skill in the television field and I rather resent those who think they can tell a producer what should go in a TV show, but the enclosed are a few angles that might whet your mind.

Largest is a professional grand juror, both state and federal.

4. See differences in pay between federal and state grand juries.

5. Note Chicago scandal and controversy over bugging of juries.

6. Women on juries -- recent and probably not universal.

7. Run-away juries.

8. England abolished grand juries because there is no right of confrontation by a person about to be indicted, so people are held for trial by a preliminary hearing before a magistrate.

9. The breadth of the jury system exists merely only in Russia; and note Judge Peck's violent campaign to abolish.

10. Impanelling a jury could be shown visually with Edward Bennett Williams and Paul Williams, the District Attorney, possibly taking part.

11. In the Costello case Paul Williams admitted they had asked the Treasury to look over the tax returns of all the prospective jurors and rate them in relation to the attitude toward the government.

12. See brief memorandum about this shocking practice enclosed.

13. Secrecy of juries and wide misunderstanding as to secrecy of juries as distinguished from witnesses.

14. Note that the federal government sends the FBI out to interview every juror in cases on hung and acquittals. See Hoffa case -- note effect on jurors.

15. Indictments are now legal before federal grand juries even though all of the evidence be hearsay, and there is not a word of competent evidence before the grand jury. See opinion of Hugo Black in U.S. vs. Costello --

Notes re TV show dealing with Jury System

1. There are two systems. In Nantucket you cannot get a jury where some juror is not related to a witness, a party or a lawyer -- in the big cities, if a juror has heard of the case he is apt to be challenged.

2. Take a look at the types of peopel, varying from state to state who are excused from jury duty.

3. Pick up the general trend of dollars paid to jurors, which used to make it worth while in periods of employment for people to want to get on the jury. See distinction between grand juries and petty juries, and note that a grand jury can be kept in session for more than a year.

Incidentally, Margaret is a professional grand juror, both state and federal.

4. See difference in pay between federal and state grand juries.

5. Note Chicago material and controversy over bugging of juries.

6. Women on juries -- recent and probably not universal.

7. Run-away juries.

8. England abolished grand juries because there is no right of confrontation by a person about to be indicted, so people are held for trial by a preliminary hearing before a magistrate.

9. The breadth of the jury system exists merely only in Russia; and note Judge Peck's violent campaign to abolish.

10. Impanelling a jury could be shown visually with Edward Bennett Williams and Paul Williams, the District Attorney, possibly taking part.

11. In the Costello case Paul Williams admitted they had asked the Treasury to look over the tax returns of all the prospective jurors and rate them in relation to the attitude toward the government.

12. See brief memorandum about this shocking practice enclosed.

13. Secrecy of jurors and wide misunderstanding as to secrecy of juries as distinguished from witnesses.

14. Note that the federal government sends the FBI out to interview every juror in cases on important acquittals. See Hoffa case -- note effect on jurors.

15. Indictments are now legal before federal grand juries even though all of the evidence be hearsay, and there is not a word of competent evidence before the grand jury. See opinion of Hugo Black in U.S. vs. Costello -- as a result, prosecutors now are getting indictments which seriously can injure people and frankly tell grand juries that the case cannot come to trial until they get real evidence but that an indictment based on hearsay will help because it prevents the statute of limitations from running out.

16. Terriblecomplaint of jurors in big cities hanging around waiting to be called.

17. Note that it sometimes takes weeks to get a grand jury.

18. A lot of information can be gotten from the Association of Grand Jurors.

19. Note that in some jurisdictions jurors need not act unanimously -- note juries of six; note juries of 12, with two extras in case of sickness, etc.

1. Enclosed find my law note of the day. It is interesting that no commentator so far as discussed this important issue -- the practice of the Treasury Department in the Costello case to review tax returns of all jurors.

2. When you get around to the integration program, note the enclosed letter for a December 15th celebration of the Truman Committee.

3. I have a lot of material on the changing folkway: how the Statler was opened in Washington; the Belmont and Algonquin, forty years ago, were the only hotels where I could go with my Negro friends for lunch; and why LaGuardia suppressed the report on Harlem made at his request, etc.

4. I suggest you confirm to Sydney Baron any arrangement you made for January to interview his client. I know he is under great pressure from your competitors, if any.

Dear Morris:

The only guy who can give you access to our material on Galindez is Irving Gitlin, in our shop. I am sure he will help if he can.

I shall be back on the treadmill about the tenth of September, and hope to see you soon thereafter.

My dear Ed:

You may have noted in the press that I have undertaken the chore of trying to solve the triple mystery arising out of the Galindez disappearance.

I missed your program. I have heard the recording, and I am most anxious to know whether you can make available to me those members of your research staff with whom I could discuss the vast amount of information that I have received.

I am setting up a staff, primarily composed of violent anti-Trujillos, and after two or three months hope to develop what might be termed an indictment so that I can go to the Dominican Republic and examine Trujillo, his employees and all of the records of his government which have a bearing on the situation.

I understand that you wont be back for some time, and I realize that this letter should not be sent on to you while you are getting a few more days from all your ordinary, but fortunately enjoyable, rat-race.

Give me a ring if you want further information.

Yours,

MORRIS L. ERNST

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I thought you would be particularly interested in getting an advance glimpse of Look's up-coming article on General Trujillo and the extraordinary lobby he maintains in this country.

I have enclosed advance tear-sheets of this piece (by Fletcher Knebel) which will appear in the issue of Look out Tuesday.

Among the interesting items brought out in the article is the incident concerning Representative Porter of Oregon and Representative McCormack of Massachusetts.

Sincerely,

How Trujillo spends a million in the U.S.A.

Self-styled "benefactor" of the Dominican Republic, Trujillo last year spent almost $1 million in America chiefly to win good will. He has received $6 million in U. S. aid.

A formidable team of influential friends and registered agents in New York and Washington have not changed the "wrong impression" Americans have of the Dominican Republic's dictator

By FLETCHER KNEBEL LOOK WASHINGTON BUREAU

THE OWNER-OPERATOR of one of the world's smallest and tidiest dictatorships is behind what may be the most extraordinary of all the foreign lobbies that have operated in the United States.

He is wealthy, proud, tough, 65-year-old Rafael Leónidas Trujillo Molina. As generalissimo, chief and self-styled "benefactor" of the Dominican Republic, he dictates with an iron hand the affairs of a sugar-crop country that covers two thirds of a Caribbean island—a nation about the size of West Virginia.

Friends of Trujillo or his regime include a former Truman ambassador, a brother-in-law of Mrs. Dwight D. Eisenhower, a son-in-law of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles and the Democratic leader of the House. His registered agents have included a son of the late President Roosevelt. His tourism has been promoted by a former chief of U. S. military aid. In 1956, Trujillo spent almost $1 million in traceable funds in the U. S. chiefly to spread his fame and woo good will.

For all the action on behalf of the Dominican Republic, Trujillo fell on hard times in the U. S. press recently. The bad publicity followed a series of murders and mysterious disappearances of his foes in the United States and Cuba and the killing of an American pilot, Gerald Murphy, on Dominican soil. But the effort still operates at full blast.

Many of the Americans who side with Trujillo are men of important reputation. William D. Pawley, U. S. ambassador to Peru and Brazil in the Truman administration, serves as unpaid adviser to Trujillo's government on minerals and production. He also heads a mining exploration enterprise in the Dominican Republic. Pawley regards Trujillo as a "genius" and feels that a Communist campaign to destroy him has victimized the American press.

Robert Y. Hinshaw, son-in-law of Secretary of State Dulles, spent considerable time in the Dominican Republic at the invitation of Trujillo, although he later indicated doubt that the good in the Trujillo regime outweighed the bad.

Mamie Eisenhower's brother-in-law, Col. G. Gordon Moore, Jr., a retired Army officer, has had business dealings with the Dominican regime. His comments on the dictator add up on the plus side.

A bill pending in Congress would yield $80,000 to a Washington importer in a complicated Dominican sugar deal originated by Colonel Moore. The money would be refunded to Robert G. Lynch, who shares office space with Moore. The bill would make retroactive to June 30, 1955, a provision of the sugar law which refunds duties on sugar imported for animal feed.

Colonel Moore had arranged for the purchase of 7,000 tons of "green sugar" in the Dominican Republic in late 1955, acting as broker for Lynch. "I would in no way benefit from the bill," says Moore. "The only thing I did was go down there and get the sugar."

Maj. Gen. George H. Olmsted (U.S.A.R.), a Des Moines insurance executive, was head of America's military-assistance program from late 1951 to early 1953. Several months before he left office, he entertained Trujillo at luncheon in the Pentagon. After he left the Government, General Olmsted visited the Dominican Republic and signed a contract to promote the country's tourist trade. Olmsted's International Services, Inc., was paid $24,000 by the Dominican Republic in 1954, $27,500 in 1955 and $270,000 last year.

Olmsted's firm also is a concessionaire in the free port of Ciudad Trujillo, chief city of the Dominican Republic, with an inventory varying between $20,000 and $50,000. Olmsted says of the dictator:

"I respect him for the many good things he has done for his country and ours. He has always been stanchly pro-United States and anti-Communist. I would be quick in condemning anyone for terrorism, kidnapping or murder, should guilt be established."

Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., served a hectic year as special counsel for the Dominican Republic in partnership with Charles Patrick Clark, $75,000-a-year lobbyist for Spain. The pair split a $60,000 fee from the Trujillo regime the first year. The contract had another year to run, but Roosevelt & Clark severed the connection on February 28 after a blizzard of protest which threatened to freeze young Roosevelt's political future.

Press reports of unsolved crimes spur Dominican

In April of last year, Joseph G. Feeney, a White House legislative aide during the Truman administration, signed up with Maj. Gen. Manuel de Moya, Trujillo's top aide, to represent the Dominican Republic in matters of "economic welfare" at $1,500 a month. Feeney indicated he placed little stock in stories of Trujillo terror on U. S. soil, declaring nothing had been confirmed in a court of law.

The law firm of Brookhart, Becker & Dorsey represents the Dominican government sugar commission and last year represented another Dominican government arm, the Agencia Industrial, at a fee of $2,500 a month. Smith W. Brookhart is a son of the late Iowa Republican senator. Ralph E. Becker is a former chairman of the National Federation of Young Republican Clubs and a good friend of Sherman Adams, assistant to President Eisenhower.

Cummings, Sellers, Reeves & Conner, another Washington law firm, represents the Dominican Embassy at $2,000 a month. Albert L. Reeves, Jr., a former Republican congressman from Missouri, is the firm's chief contact with the Dominicans.

Sugar Quota Is Boosted

During the big sugar-quota fight, Trujillo's government relied chiefly on the Washington law firm of Surrey, Karasik, Gould & Efron, which received payments from the Dominican sugar commission of $25,000 in 1954, $57,076 in 1955 and $38,612 in 1956. Walter S. Surrey and Monroe Karasik, both veterans of government posts under the Democratic administrations, performed ably for Trujillo's regime. Congress doubled the Dominican Republic's sugar quota, from less than 30,000 tons to more than 60,000 tons annually.

Trujillo's aides made the firm's labors smoother by taking several members of the House Agriculture Committee on an all-expense trip to the Dominican Republic in the spring of 1955. As the sugar bill cleared the House, it allotted 80,000 tons to Trujilloland, but non-traveling senators trimmed back the amount.

Other law firms registered as agents for the Dominican interests have included the Washington firm of Culbertson, Briggs & Pendleton ($31,000 from the Dominican Sugar Institute since 1950), the Washington firm of Davies, Richberg, Tydings, Beebe & Landa ($43,750 from the Bergantin Corp. for 1954 and 1955) and the New York firm of Townley, Updike, Carter & Rodgers ($5,145 from the Dominican Republic Information Center for 1956).

The Dominican Republic Information Center in New York City is the fountain of Trujillo's propaganda in the United States and is operated by Harry C. Klemfuss, former New York newspaperman. This institution used to operate on less than $26,000 a year, telling the story of the Generalissimo's benevolences to his people, but expenditures vaulted to $174,000 in 1955 and have stayed at that level. Klemfuss admitted that press reports of unsolved crimes plaguing the Trujillo government provoked the counterburst of activity.

Two years ago, Klemfuss enlisted the literary talents of Stanley Walker, famous New York newspaperman now retired to Texas, to turn out a biography of Trujillo. Walker reported to the Justice Department's foreign-agents section that he had received $1,800 for the 7,800-word production. The Center paid for and distributed the work.

For a short time last year, the New York advertising firm of Albert Frank-Guenther Law, Inc., assisted the Information Center, for the sum of $55,000. One of the chores of the firm, according to its report to the Justice Department, was to prepare a letter to the New York Times, signed by seven prominent Dominican officials. The letter defended the Trujillo regime and blasted his detractors, a majority of whom were denounced as "known or hidden Communists."

But Dominicans aren't satisfied that the "benefactor" has been properly glorified in the United States. The Dominican Embassy has contracted with Vantage Press, Inc., to bring out a reprint of Trujillo by Abelardo R. Nanita, published in the Dominican Republic in 1954. Former Dominican Ambassador Joaquin E. Salazar said the Embassy will foot the printing bill for the biography and buy up copies, just in case the volume doesn't leap into the best-seller list.

A more ambitious literary endeavor has been undertaken by John V. Hinkel, Washington public-relations man. He has contracted with the University of Santo Domingo to do a 20-chapter compendium on the Dominican Republic.

Hinkel advised the Justice Department that the volume will be devoid of political propaganda, but the foreign-agents section wants to see the final version before it decides whether Hinkel and his associate authors must register. Hinkel admits his chapter on the current government may be touchy, but feels safe on all other chapters, including one on the importance of the Dominican Republic to Western defense by Gen. Lemuel C. Shepherd, Jr., chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board and former Marine Corps commandant.

Jack Kofoed, Miami Herald columnist, received $30,000 for collaborating on an autobiography of Trujillo. The task came to an end before Kofoed touched a typewriter. Kofoed signed for the job in 1952. The checks flowed in, but Trujillo wouldn't sit still to be interviewed. "I think when they got the idea that I wanted the real story," says Kofoed, "they wouldn't go for it."

Members of Congress Are Honored

The Dominicans have been grateful to members of Congress. Last winter, Ambassador Salazar bestowed the Order of Duarte-Sánchez-Mella on five Americans at a ceremony which took place under a portrait of Trujillo. Included were three members of Congress—House Democratic Leader John W. McCormack of Massachusetts, Rep. Katharine St. George (Rep., N. Y.) and Rep. Donald L. Jackson (Rep., Calif.). Jackson got his award in absentia.

The decorations were conferred just a day before Rep. Charles O. Porter (Dem., Ore.) unleashed a blistering House attack on Trujillo, accusing him of establishing a "network of terror" in the U. S. Porter sent a private note to McCormack, suggesting that he might want to defer the ceremony until he had heard Porter's speech. McCormack replied that the suggestion was "presumptuous."

To date, about $6 million in military aid has flowed to Trujillo's armed forces. In the fiscal year just ended, the debt-free Republic received $237,000 in American economic assistance, chiefly for education, a Senate committee reported. Also in 1956, besides the doubling of the Dominican Republic's sugar quota on the U. S. market, an atomic-energy agreement was signed by which the Republic could negotiate for our uranium-235 to operate a research reactor.

Not everything has gone Trujillo's way recently. John J. Frank, Washington attorney and former agent for both the FBI and the Central Intelligence Agency, was indicted for allegedly accepting pay from the Republic without registering with the Justice Department as a foreign agent. The Inter-American Press Association condemned the Trujillo dictatorship for the unsolved killings of his foes and warned members against Trujillo's plan to appoint "honorary consuls" in American cities to gain prestige. Congressman Porter launched a one-man crusade to deny further bestowal of American favors on Trujillo. The State Department rejected the Dominican explanation of the Murphy killing and investigated a speech by Trujillo aide de Moya (now ambassador to the U. S.) which attacked "pseudo-liberals" opposing the regime. To cap Trujillo's troubles, a Federal grand jury probed the slayings and the status of his diplomatic agents.

For the first time, the little dictator has a fight on his hands in the United States. But he is a long way from giving up. END

Dear Ed:

I assume you are as heartsick and I am over the Dulles behavior which destroyed the good will and faith needed to carry on our historic relations with France and England. I have been in Washington and have done a lot of exploring as to minor steps that could be taken to heal the wounds.

And now, Dr. Murrow, what would you think of doing a Person to Person half hour show with Ismay. I think this would be a forerunner to getting Ismay over to the United States so that he could chat, after dinner, with Ike about the need of oil for the continuance of NATO. If we don't deliver and finance oil for the winter, the assumption goes that Europe will not vote enough moneys to give NATO what it needs for even meager existence. My guess is that I could get Ismay over here so that your Person to Person could be done in the United States and save you from competing with Dulles, in peripatetic terms.

I have another hunch which could lead up to the Ismay interview. I think Walter Lippmann has done the most thoughtful writing in the last three weeks. What about a half hour Person to Person with Lippmann.

Don't be irritated if these two suggestions indicate what is a fact -- my preference for the Ismay - Lippmann type rather than the glamour puss type. The latter have their function but it is closer to the bedroom than the parlors where the interviews take place.

Your talk about Mr. F stayed in my mind. I know less of the facts than you do. I have a hunch that despite his being at the doorstep of the court, ingenuity might produce more prompt and salutary results than if the matter were to wend its way through the courts. By and large, the court as a forum is valueless for such purposes as libel and custody of children. In both these situations the parties get wrecked on the way.

Moreover, I should imagine that CBS might be highly embarrassed by a trial. I know what I could do to the system at CBS as it existed under Danny if I were handling the case.

Let me know if you or your associates want to see me. I will get you plane tickets to Nantucket.

I have just read a script of a great movie dealing with book burnings, a script I think that was inspired, in part, by your position on libraries and book censorship. Dear Ed:

I spoke to you sometime ago to see if there was any interest on the part of CBS in Ted Granik's two programs -- American Forum and the Youth Program. Either you or some of your associates told me that you knew about the situation.

I think it might be worth your while to have me bring Granik up to see you. He will be in town this week. I may be able to seduce him into selling part or all of either program.

Please wire or telephone me.

Dear Morrie:

Ted Moscoso tells me your letter gave rise to an interesting discussion in a recent Cabinet meeting. The concensus seemed to be that a Department of Cultural Values (I guess that's my label, not yours) would encounter too many pragmatic difficulties in functioning. It's interesting to note, though, that in the Governor's speech to the legislature last week, a translation of which I've just received, he refers to you as follows:

"Probably more cars will be purchased than at present, but they will constitute a much smaller proportion of the income than at present. Probably, as Morris Ernst predicts for the U. S., they will be smaller cars, easier to park. Were this to be so, it would be because in the table of values the imitation of neighbors would have lost its motivating power. Until this motivation is fully replaced by one of more originality, of more similarity to the creative spirit of man, we will not have what in good conscience we can call a good civilization."

In the same speech he also makes some other illuminating points:

Operation Bootstrap since 1940 has raised the net income of Puerto Rico from 230 million dollars to one billion, an increase of 107 per cent.

It has doubled productivity per worker.

It has raised labor's earnings from 120 million dollars to 280 million dollars on the same basis of 1940 prices, without any increase in the labor force.

It has increased business earnings from 75 million to 155 million.

It has doubled school enrollment, from 300,000 to 600,000.

He also gave a classic definition that I [illegible] worth quoting to you:

"Political advancement may be measured by the increase in the authority of each individual vote over matters that concern it when it is deposited in the ballot box and by the respect of the majority for the rights of the minority and that of the minorities for the constitutional decisions of the majority and of all for the dignity of the individual."

Morris, don't you think that a man who has accomplished so much for this place that was called "The Stricken Land" 15 years ago ought to make an excellent Person-to-Person for Ed Murrow? Especially when you consider that he lives in one of the hemisphere's most historic and beautiful residences. And that he's the kind of guy who won't let them use the air-conditioning in his office because it would drive out a little bird that's made a nest in the chandelier over his desk - visible to every visitor.

Since you know Murrow and I don't, you might mention some of these facts to him. If he wanted to come down here with any of his staff we would cooperate in every way. We could even supply a raison d'etre -- in early May this country is setting aside a week of celebration of the fact that they have just succeeded in pushing the balance of the economy over from agriculture to industry. Quite an achievement when you consider that 15 years ago this was a one-crop country, existing, if it could be called that, on six months' work a year in the sugar fields for most of the population.

It all adds up to a side of "the Puerto Rican question" that most Americans don't know, but need to know. To me it seems to present a superb opportunity for the sort of liberal public service presentation without sacrifice of entertainment values that Murrow does so well.

Best regards to you and Mrs. Ernst and greetings to Harriet.

Dear Morris:

I thought I had better report that we are presently at dead center on the "Good News" project. Art Hayes, the President of the Radio Division and who chatted with us for a while during your visit to my office, heard your recorded material a couple of days after that visit and suggested that inasmuch as it was proposed that Mrs. Hobson would actually do the programs, we ask her to cut a couple of five-minute records to show what the actual broadcasts would be like. Shortly after Art spoke to me, Miss Bertha Case (Mrs. Hobson's MCA representative) telephoned me and I relayed the suggestion to her. Miss Case called me back to report that Mrs. Hobson would like a stronger expression of interest on our part before she did any work on the matter and, in the meantime, would like me to send her both your recordings and your portfolio of suggestions for individual programs.

I very much hope that we will be able to proceed with the project.

Dear Ed:

Just because you have a million foot of film that you have to reduce to some minuscule amount, I write to urge that you squeeze into the program the concept I mentioned to you over the telephone. I refer to a loan to Egypt and other Arab states in order to help irrigate and develop land facilities so that the Arab world can empty the camps of their kith and kin.

I put this matter up to the State Department and the Pentagon over the years, being convinced that a loan could be negotiated conditioned on the emptying of the camps, and that as long as the camps are there they will remain as a symbol to validate a question which I was asked by many members of the Egyptian Cabinet: must we teach our children to kill Jews? In other words, were you ever mean to Janet except when you were in the wrong?

If your show could inject this one concept into the arena of debate, I am quite sure that the bait would be chased by the Arab states.

This is the trip I should have taken with you so as to have the above program confirmed to you in Egypt.

Yours,

Morris L. Ernst

P. S. I am off to Russia on April 6th on a very exciting mission. Enc

The Economy in 1965 and 1975—Co

By 1965 the nation's gross national product will be around $535 billion in the view of Arno H. Johnson, vice-president and director of research for J. Walter Thompson Co. Mr. Johnson's reasoning is outlined in an interview reprinted here from the December issue of "Challenge" magazine, published by the Institute of Economic Affairs of New York University. Inset below, Haig Babian, editor of the magazine, recapitulates the forecasts of top economists for 1975 and foresees an American national economy at the $675 billion mark by that year.

Q.—Mr. Johnson, in a recent speech you stated that by 1965 we should be producing more than $500 billion in goods and services annually. You said the big problem will be to raise our sights on what constitutes a good standard of living so that we can actually consume what we shall be producing. Is that substantially correct?

A.—I think we have pretty well established now that our ability to produce is far beyond what we believed possible before the war. That $500 billion you mentioned was really the President's estimate of our ability to produce in 1965. The Joint Congressional Committee on the Economic Report set the figure even higher—at $535 billion—and I think that is a reasonable projection in terms of our probable labor force and our history of economic expansion since the war.

Consumer Figures

Q.—What would such a level of gross national product represent in terms of consumer items that would have to be absorbed?

A.—In order to support a $500 billion economy of production—allowing for adequate defense requirements, for new plant and equipment and government expenditures—we shall have to consume $350 to $357 billion worth of personal goods and services. That would call for a 50 per cent increase in the over-all standard of living in the next ten years. Unless we change some of our concepts of what a high standard of living should be, our ability to produce will outrun our ability to consume.

Q.—Does this imply that the disposable income with which to buy will be available to consumers?

A.—Productivity in itself produces revenue. In other words, a production of $500 billion will produce the revenue to buy up that production, by and large. That is the way our economy is based. And the major part of that revenue obviously goes to the people who produce the goods and services.

Q.—What do you mean when you say we need a change in our concepts of what a high standard of living should be?

Different Concept

A.—If you study the pre-war living standards of our population—the government made some studies early in 1942—and divide up the population by income groups from under $500 a year up to over $10,000, you will find there was a different concept of living standards in almost each income group. That is demonstrated even in the case of goods. There was, pre-war, a very definite pattern of increasing consumption on a physical and dollar basis at each income level. My point is that in pre-war years, the average income of a family in a middle-income bracket was $1,000 to $1,500. We have moved up in our income groups so rapidly that a few years from now, the major portion of families will have annual incomes of more than $5,000. Allowances should be made for the shrinking value of the dollar, of course. But these families moving up do represent a great opportunity for changes in our standard of living even if they were to take on only the kind of a standard of living that upper-middle-income people enjoyed in pre-war days.

Q.—Is a rising standard of living always characterized by an increased purchase of the same goods?

A.—As you get up into the area of better and higher incomes, there is an increase in the disposable income that might be called discretionary—beyond just the bare needs—which means that different individuals will have different ways in which to spend. Some will want to take a trip to Europe. Others will like to engage in sports, to have a shotgun, or something like that. So it isn't necessarily true that you have exactly the same pattern.

Q.—Mr. Johnson, how does a family move up into a higher income bracket? Which comes first, the greater production or the higher income?

Leapfrog Theory

A.—The two go together like two people playing leapfrog. I think perhaps, the ability to produce comes first—not necessarily the production itself, because then you pile up too much—but the ability to produce, the technological advance. That's the thing, in my estimation, that makes the higher pay check available. With increased productivity per worker or per capita, obviously the revenue that can be paid that worker or person will be greater. Now, the transition from greater productivity to higher incomes is not always smooth. But it has been going on nicely during the last five years when the average weekly earnings in manufacturing increased by 20 per cent while there was practically no change in the price level.

On Spending Habits

Q.—Now, in order to keep our economy running smoothly, your contention is that the consumer must be educated to use his income to buy up the productivity. Don't you believe people can make up their own minds about how to spend their money?

A.—You will have to remember that the background, the environment of a majority of us, was keyed to a lower level of over-all productivity in this country. The mass of our population lived, pre-war, at incomes of around $25 a week, which perforce, meant that most of us were on the wrong side of the railroad tracks by today's standards. As productivity increased, most of us have increased our ability to buy goods and services beyond the level of necessity according to pre-war standards. I believe people need to be stimulated to use

The Mechanics of $675

Workers, Youngsters and Elderly Pe

By Haig Babian

In 1975 the (worker to non-worker) ratio is likely to be 1 per every 2.53, with about 87 million jobholders compared to today's 65 million.

Unless there is a drastic revision in the birth-rate schedule of the next twenty years . . . the labor force of 1975 will have to support more oldsters and youngsters, in grander style, than any other productive group has ever been called upon to do.

Shorter Work Week?

. . . Proceeding conservatively, a work force of 87 million will produce an income of $339 million dollars every hour. During the course of a 40-hour week at an average of 50 weeks per year, the annual income comes to $678 billion. The gross national product would be around $800 billion.

It is unlikely however, that such an increase in the national product would be digestible; nor would the will to work so hard be present in the labor force. Far more likely is a gradual reduction in the work week; by 1975 it will be on a 4-day, 32-hour schedule.

This would, in turn, reduce national income to $543 billion, and the gross national product to approximately $675 billion. The average family income in 1975 would be approximately $8,000 per year. All these figures are given in the value of the 1956 dollar.

If these figures appear formidable . . . consider what a projected gross national product of $675 billion represents. In 1950, the total wealth of the United States amounted to $1 trillion. Therefore, in the single year of 1975, we expect to produce 67.5 per cent of what the whole country was worth in 1950.

Is this possible, even though we shall be working only a 32-hour week? It is possible—if we set aside sufficient sums from current income in order to build up our capacity to satisfy future desires.

*Q.—Don't you believe people ll naturally want to buy a r, a refrigerator, a TV set,
d so forth, once they have e money to do so?*

Misleading Point

A.—A higher standard of liv-g cannot be measured merely physical units. I think too any people look upon the du-ble goods in our economy as a ue measure of our new pattern living. That is very mislead-g because only some 14 per nt of our current expenditure $250,000,000,000 for goods and vices represents consumer rchase of durable goods. In her words, the standard of liv-g is measured only in part by rable goods like automobiles.
covers a great many other ings. Since 1947, there has en a very big increase in ex-nditures of the average family some form of education.
ere has been a very big inase in what families allocate for religious activities. There has been a change in the diet and a change in what people do in their leisure time, the way they enjoy life. There has been a trend toward larger families. I think this is all a part of our new standard of living.

Q.—What can we do to make ourselves more capable of absorbing the potential of our productive capacity?

Bathing Habits

A.—I don't think there is any one thing that any one can do. Certainly business men, by progressive marketing and educational efforts, can help considerably. Let me illustrate my point with a simple story about bathing habits. If you divide the population up into income quartiles, you will find that the people in the pre-war higher income groups took a great many more baths than in the next income groups, and so on down the scale. Yet, the self-interest of a manufacturer, through the various pressures of magazine and television advertising, can help to change the bathing habits of people whose incomes have gone up during the last sixteen years. In other words, if people were to move up even in their bathing habits, from the levels of the lower middle class of 1940 to the levels of the upper class of 1940, you'd have terrific increases in markets for soap and in demand for water in cities. It is as simple as that.

[Editor's Note: Although it did not mention bathing habits, the Department of Commerce last week agreed with Mr. Johnson, estimating that use of water would come close to doubling by 1957. The United States now uses 262,000,000,000 gallons daily.]

Q.—Can we always assume that the goods the manufacturers have available are really directly related to people's needs? In other words, is there a potential danger that manufacturers will concentrate on getting rid of the goods they wish people to buy rather than what people really want?

Watch That Tangent!

A.—I think you can go off on a tangent on both counts. As you have mass millions moving up into higher income groups, their concept of a need may not be what really is the best since many have not had a chance to experience something different. So I don't think you can rely entirely on consumers telling you what they want or what they need, because their needs, their motives, are based on concepts derived from past experience. On the other hand, I think it's just as dangerous for a manufacturer to come out and produce something, and then, with a huge promotion effort, cram this down people's throats. That is bad, too, and in the long run it won't work anyway. There has to be an element of working in between.

Q.—There has been a great deal of talk about developing a market for that second car. Will this meet a real need?

A.—Until a few years ago, manufacturers thought of the second-car market only as a luxury market. Consumer surveys now show that 17 million families are single-car families; the vehicle is driven to work every day by some member of the family, and the family is immobilized five or six days of the week. Those left at home aren't always conscious of the need for a second car, yet the need is clearly there. The need will be expressed once the woman decides she wants a car and her man agrees she should have one.

Any Limit?

Q.—Is there any limit to this self-regenerative process of higher productivity, higher incomes, greater expenditures and higher productivity again?

A.—The only limit I see is productivity of the people and availability of raw materials. We've found that a great many of our raw materials are not necessarily scarce because new things can come in as substitutes. I don't know where the limit is.

Q.—Mr. Johnson, provided there is no war or abnormal interruption in the production processes, would you say this preoccupation with what the consumer will do is a fairly normal and permanent consideration from now on?

A.—I think it is, in our present economy. I think it may have been a consideration before the war, but we didn't recognize it. In my estimation the major problem is definitely that of prompting consumption, which is not a problem at all, but an opportunity.

rantees the availability of cretionary income for con-uctive purposes—even though original donors may not un-preciate the consequences until explanations are made. No one loses. Every one gains.

Management will have to buy more automation than any one thought would be possible three years ago—if the goals for 1975 are to be realized. This requires a higher degree of labor-management co-operation than has ever existed before.

Labor's Role

Labor's share of the annual improvement factor, already in the majority, cannot be raised much more without jeopardizing the ability of business to finance itself into 1975 standards. This is not to suggest that labor cannot get more. It can, but only if business can get enough.

It would be perfect if labor could grasp this point without any prompting from management. How far the realization from perfect will be is one thing a prognosticator does not dare to guess at.

Yet, on this single point of resolving how the rewards shall be allocated, rests the future and shape of 1975.

My dear Ed,

Three possible scoop items:

1. I have been advised, in confidence, that the Royal Commission on Broadcasting will have its report ready some time this week for tabling in the House of Commons. I have a copy of the report, which even mentions you in complimentary fashion. Of course, there can be no mention before the Prime Minister accepts the report. If you want to examine it in confidence beforehand, let me know.

2. Also, in confidence, I have been invited to sit with the Presidents of the five City Colleges in regard to the policy considerations involved in the Gates case -- speakers on campuses.

3. On April 22nd, the United States Supreme Court will review, for the first time, the constitutionality of obscenity laws. I am sending you a copy of the brief which I filed. This is an amusing story because, for the first time in the history of the Court, you will see a brief filed by a lawyer without a client.

Let one of your brain trust telephone me. I will hand over such other information as I can properly do. In the meanwhile, all of this is off-the-record.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 2

Argument:

POINT I. Although originally the First Amendment forbade the abridgement of all speech and press we must now recognize that the ideas underlying the First Amendment fall into three distinct and separate categories 3

(a) In the area of seditious words, the Government has the power to abridge freedom of speech and press 5

(b) In the area of "merchandise words," the Government has the power to abridge freedom of speech and press 6

(c) But in the area of ideas qua ideas, the Government may not abridge freedom of speech and press 7

POINT II. Section 1461 of Title 18 of the United States Code, 62 Stat. 768, 69 Stat. 183, invades the reserved powers of the States in violation of the First, Ninth and Tenth Amendments 8

(a) The Constitution delegates no power to the Federal Government to regulate community morals 10

PAGE

(b) The Constitution delegates no power to the Federal Government to regulate speech or press 11

(c) Congress cannot invoke the commerce power, the postal power or the power to regulate imports as a basis for regulating such speech or press 12

(1) The First Amendment was intended to prohibit regulation of speech and press by the Federal Government under any enumerated power 13

(2) The purpose of the First, Ninth and Tenth Amendments is subverted if speech and press can be regulated by the Federal Government as incidents to exercise of the commerce, postal or importation powers 15

(d) Power over speech and press is in the States alone 19

(1) An Amendment to forbid State regulation of speech and press was rejected..... 20

(2) The Ninth and Tenth Amendments reiterate State power 21

(3) Nationwide standards for judging "obscenity" do not exist 23

(4) Federal obscenity law interferes with the power of the States to mold the moral standards of the community..... 25

POINT III. The power residing in the States over speech and press is not beyond all Federal control 27

PAGE

POINT IV. If the Federal Government does possess power in this area, the Federal obscenity statute is unconstitutional in that it violates the First and Fifth Amendments 29

(a) Freedom of expression is the rule 29

(b) "Obscene" cannot be defined 32

(c) "Obscenity" depends on an infinity of variables which render the law completely uncertain 33

(d) The uncertainty of the standard is shown by the contradictory results of recent obscenity proceedings 35

(e) The uncertainties of the obscenity laws render them void for vagueness under the Fifth Amendment 37

(f) The rule of certainty is particularly important when First Amendment rights are affected 38

No. 582

SAMUEL ROTH,

Petitioner,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Respondent.

BRIEF OF MORRIS L. ERNST
Amicus Curiae

Interest of the Amicus

For more than 40 years at the bar I have had the great good fortune to be involved in First Amendment causes. In the writing of books and articles, more than I now like to recall, I have had a deep and satisfying concern with the problems of censorship over the mind of man.

I surmise that such enjoyed dedication to this important sphere of the law prompted the Solicitor General to give permission to the filing of this brief—in opposition, I assume, to what may be his own position. I express here my gratitude together with a hope that this brief may be of some slight aid to the Court. I speak only my own mind and not that of any other person or group.

Summary of the Argument

The First Amendment must be construed in the light of its historical development if we are constitutionally to resolve the problems which have arisen in connection with the attempted regulation of freedom of speech and press. In that light, we must now recognize that there are three different areas of ideas which claim Constitutional protection. Of these, the Federal Government has the power to regulate the two groups which embrace seditious words and "merchandise words," respectively. But the third group, which is here termed that of Ideas qua Ideas, consists of those ideas which have as their purpose purely their impact on the mind of man; and it is this last group which carves out an area in the realm of ideas which the First Amendment places beyond the power of the National Government.

This construction of the First Amendment is in accord with the fundamental concepts underlying the Ninth and Tenth Amendments by which there was reserved to the States the regulation of the morals of the community. The absence of centrally decreed uniformity in this area of folkways and morals is vital to the preservation of Federalism in this Republic.

The history of the Constitutional Convention, of the Bill of Rights and of proposals debated in the earlier Congresses makes it abundantly clear that it was not the intent to grant to the central government by way of the postal, commerce or importation powers legislative authority in those areas reserved implicitly in the original Constitution and explicitly by the First, Ninth and Tenth Amendments to the States. The statute here involved bears witness to the fulfillment of the prophetic fear that the Congress will seize upon these powers to base claims to those reserved powers of the states.

The only qualification which may be imposed on the power of the states over speech and press in the areas of Ideas qua Ideas is that which is ordained by the 14th Amendment.

"Obscenity" being a word incapable of precise definition and dependent in any particular situation upon an infinity of variables cannot serve as a Constitutional basis for predicating criminal liability. The Fifth Amendment forbids this.

The evil aimed at is unclear; proof of the causal relationship between the material protected by the First Amendment and the supposed evil does not exist at this moment of our history.

POINT I

Although originally the First Amendment forbade the abridgement of all speech and press, we must now recognize that the ideas underlying the First Amendment fall into three distinct and separate categories.

Freedom for all material that goes to the mind of man is a concept historically impressive. Yet few would deny that our present Constitutional attitudes concerning this concept are less than precise. Since the days of the Founding Fathers, totally new pressures on the Republic have arisen and have compounded the imprecision of the concept.

It is my thought that the resolution of the present Constitutional confusions and dilemmas may be assisted by examination of the distinctions between the three streams of ideas with which the freedoms of speech and press are presently concerned. I suggest that Constitutional history indicates that a clarification is now necessary in terms of the distinctions between that speech and press which affect, in one sector, the preservation of governmental sovereignty; that in a second sector, trade and commerce in Things; and that in a third sector, ideas qua ideas.

The goodness or badness of ideas in this last sector can be tested only over the ages, and on such a gamble do we predicate our way of life.

Man has ever had a fear of ideas. The first clearly pronounced target was blasphemy during the early ages. Then, as the power shifted from the church to the state and from clergy to kings, the threat of the fearful became fixated upon sedition. Thereafter followed the Industrial Revolution and the Distributive Revolution, the latter utilizing words and ideas as auxiliaries to merchandise; and the Court found it constitutional to abridge the speech and press employed to solicit and to sell. The last target of the censorious, first attacked in England around 1860 and in our land around 1870, is obscenity in printed materials, accompanied by presumed dangers of anti-social sexual behavior.

The first area, in which censorship was born, that of blasphemy, is no longer significant, for the Government does not undertake to punish blasphemy, nor does it undertake to define what blasphemy might be. Neither are the states permitted to legislate test acts founded upon the criteria of blasphemy. Cf. Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495 (1952).

But in three other areas into which I am persuaded speech and the flow of the press have by force of history become divided, Government has undertaken to regulate the words which may be promulgated and received by the public. I suggest that in two of these areas regulation may be constitutionally proper while in the third area it is absolutely prohibited. Without violating the First Amendment, the Government may justifiably permit abridgement of freedom of speech and press in the area of sedition and in the area of "merchandise words," but the Government may not without violating that Amendment abridge freedom of speech or press in the third area, of which "obscenity" (along with scandal, sadism, etc.) is a part. The distinctions between these various areas are distinctions of substance. It is this last area which is involved in the instant case. Here the First Amendment must be literally rendered: no abridgement is tolerable.

(a) In the area of seditious words, the Government has the power to abridge freedom of speech and press.

This first sector is comprised of ideas of sedition, those ideas that have impact on the very sovereignty of the Republic. It would be absurd to plead that our sovereign Republic is legislatively impotent to protect itself from attack. The constitutional concern in this area has shifted from that of the existence of a power to that of the selection of the criteria to be applied in the balancing, on a risk-for-risk basis, of individual freedom against national continuance. See, e.g., Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951).

It is irrelevant in this brief to indicate more than that the outer limits of freedom of speech and press might better be tested by a standard more objective than the Holmes slogan of clear and present danger (always clear to the frightened, never present to the brave!), enunciated in Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47 (1919). Rather does the Brandeis formula—is there time to make answer, or in the alternative, time to call the police—insist on greater objectivity by judge or jury before the killing of ideas:

> "* * * [N]o danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. If there be time to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies, to avert the evil by the processes of education, the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence." Brandeis, J., concurring in Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 377 (1927). See also Ernst and Katz, "Speech: Public and Private," 53 Col. L.R. 620 (1953).

(b) In the area of "merchandise words," the Government has the power to abridge freedom of speech and press.

The second sector of idea content which can be segregated from the instant case is that which concerns "merchandise words." It is an area not yet born in 1791, when our largest library was 4,000 books and we had only 100 newspapers. "Merchandise words" are words which promulgate ideas, yes, but ideas only in order to sell lottery tickets, stocks, bonds, drugs, liquor or any other Thing or Things. This includes shoes, ships, sealing wax and cabbages—but not Kings. Merchandise words are merely tools of things and do not have as their sole or prime target the mere impact on the mind of man. These are, rather, the words of commerce, the exchange between buyer and seller, the quid pro quo, the bargain and sale, the offer and acceptance.

There is no question but that the Federal government may pass legislation governing the use of merchandise words in commercial or trade activities involving commerce or the mails. See, e.g., Electric Bond and Share Company v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 303 U.S. 419 (1937).

(c) But in the area of ideas qua ideas, the Government may not abridge freedom of speech and press.

It is in the third sector of idea content that the First Amendment proscribes the abridgement of freedom of speech and press. This third sector is the sacred area of ideas for ideas' sake. This is the area of words which have as their real objective their ultimate resting place in the restless mind of man—that instrument made sacred in constitutional terms by the First Amendment.

A sentiment may seem constitutionally relevant that our daily press is breeding a race of tasteless people to whom tawdry personal relations and sadism are made to seem normal. But the question in constitutional terms can never be one of decency or taste. Forces other than law exist in our culture to develop that degree of inner security which will minimize the need for vicarious tawdry living. I suggest that much of the distortion in legal constitutional thinking arises from the failure of the judicial stream to isolate this sector from the other two.

In this area we have not the Thing but the idea; not the package but the medium; not the paper, the ink, the binding, the film, but the thought. It is the thought, the idea—educational or entertaining—which, good or bad as judged by the whims of a passing generation, is the res of this area. We are not here concerned with the collateral paper or binding which is merely employed for the transmission of the constitutionally protected ideas of man.

Over the decades this Court will no doubt have to draw lines a little to the right or a little to the left to demark the words which the Government may regulate from those words which are not seditious words, which are not merchandise words, but which are words which represent ideas qua ideas. Indeed, since Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), this Court, over a span of 26 years, has employed dicta in various cases in an effort to pinprick the frontiers of this sector. I submit that the Court might take the instant opportunity to further define these all-important frontiers.

In light of the above, I now proceed to the sacred area which the Constitution removes from National Governmental power.

POINT II

Section 1461 of Title 18 of the United States Code, 62 Stat. 768, 69 Stat. 183, invades the reserved powers of the States in violation of the First, Ninth and Tenth Amendments.

The statute here under attack, Sec. 1461 of Title 18 of the United States Code, must be read in the context of two parallel statutes, Sec. 1462 of the same Title and Sec. 1305 of Title 19. Section 1461 of Title 18 of the United States Code, in pertinent part, provides:

> "Every obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print or other publication of an indecent character; * * *
> "Is declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.
> "Whoever knowingly deposits for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, or knowingly takes the same from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing thereof, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition thereof, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

Section 1462 of Title 18 of the United States Code, in pertinent part, provides:

"Whoever brings into the United States, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or knowingly deposits with any express company or other common carrier, for carriage in interstate or foreign commerce—

"(a) any obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, motion-picture film, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of indecent character; * * *

"Whoever knowingly takes from such express company or other common carrier any matter or thing the depositing of which for carriage is herein made unlawful—

"Shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

Section 1305 of Title 19, in pertinent part provides:

"All persons are prohibited from importing into the United States from any foreign country * * * any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, writing, advertisement, circular, print, picture, drawing, or other representation, figure or image on or of paper or other material, or any cast instrument, or other article, which is obscene or immoral * * *

"(P)rovided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, admit the so-called classics or books of recognized and established literary or scientific merit, but may, in his discretion, admit such classics or books only when imported for noncommercial purposes."

In the main, Section 1462 of Title 18 prohibits the interstate transportation by common carrier of the same matter of which Sec. 1461 of that Title prohibits the mailing and of which Sec. 1305 of Title 19 prohibits the importation. The effect of these sections is pervasive regulation by the Federal government of the permissible content of printed communication (written or pictorial) in the area under review. A network of Federal law thus abridges the freedom of the people to communicate, not only across state or national boundaries but also—since Section 1461 applies to both intra- and inter-state mailing—within the boundaries of a single state.

Has the Federal Government—a government of delegated and enumerated powers only—the constitutional authority thus to restrict the rights of speech and press? It is submitted that there is no such Federal authority.

(a) The Constitution delegates no power to the Federal Government to regulate community morals.

Obscenity legislation implements governmental control over the media of communication for the purpose of regulating community morals. Regulation of community morals is, under our federal system, within the jurisdiction of the states. The Federal Government has no authority over local morals—there is no Federal power to control marriage, divorce, adultery, bigamy, or any other of the subjects related to the moral good order of the community. These matters are the concern solely of local government. The Ninth and Tenth Amendments to the Constitution affirm State power over these matters, as to which no power was delegated to Congress.

(b) The Constitution delegates no power to the Federal Government to regulate speech or press.

The original Constitution, proposed to the States by the Constitutional Convention, contained no provisions relating to the rights of speech and press. No authority to regulate speech or press was delegated, and there were no provisions curtailing Congressional authority with respect to speech or press. On the floor of the Convention, a proposal to forbid Congressional interference with freedom of the press was put forward. It was defeated on the ground that it was unnecessary in that "the power of Congress does not extend to the press" (Elliott's Debates, 545 (1854).) This belief was universally accepted by Federalists and anti-Federalists alike in the debates on ratification which ensued. And such universal acceptance must be regarded as a significant accord of the conflicting groups, for there were so few questions upon which they did agree. See Hart, "Power of Government Over Speech and Press", 29 Yale L. J. 410 (1920).

There was no doubt in the minds of the Founders—those who favored the original Constitution as well as those who insisted on amending it—that the limited powers conveyed to the Federal government did not permit Congressional regulation of speech or press. But there were many who foresaw the danger that such authority might be arrogated through a doctrine of implied powers. For this reason they urged immediate adoption of a Bill of Rights.

Thus, Hamilton, justifying the absence of a Bill of Rights said:

> "They [a Bill of Rights] would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done, which there is no power to do? Why, for instance should it be said, that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed?"

(The Federalist (J. C. Hamilton ed. 1864) 631)

To which Jefferson replied:

"Very well, I agree with you that the power is not legitimately here, and that it was not intended to be here, and that it is a subject matter which belongs to the States, the same as a common police power of the States. But there is in the Constitution a provision that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers here granted, and it might be held and construed to include regulation and legislation concerning the press. Therefore, accepting your view that it is not among such powers, we ask for a declaratory amendment to the Constitution which shall put it beyond peradventure that it is not one of the powers granted to the National Government."

(As quoted in Hart, op. cit., p. 412.)

(c) Congress cannot invoke the commerce power, the postal power or the power to regulate imports as a basis for regulating such speech or press.

As stated above, the statute here under attack must be read in the constitutional context of the statutes which forbid the importation of the same matter or its interstate transportation by common carrier. The purport of these three statutes is thus to regulate the rights of speech and press on the basis of the commerce powers and the postal power. Congress has attempted to obviate the absence of express power to regulate, on the one hand, morals, and, on the other, the media of communication, by construing the specific delegations of commerce and postal powers as permitting such regulation by inference. The scope of the statutes is sweeping and their impact on the rights of free exchange of ideas is profound. Can Congress, thus, by indirection, exercise a power not delegated? The answer appears in the negative.

(1) The First Amendment was intended to prohibit regulation of speech and press by the Federal Government under any enumerated power.

It was precisely for the purpose of preventing Federal regulation of the kind here involved that the First Amendment was passed. Exactly this the proponents of the Bill of Rights feared—that the Federal Government might find indirect ways of regulating speech and press although no express power was delegated. Jefferson's observation, that "there is in the Constitution a provision that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers here granted, and it might be held and construed to include regulation and legislation concerning the press," Hart, op. cit., 412,—was the foundation of the effort for express limitation of Congressional power. In order to achieve such a precise restriction, Madison presented the Bill of Rights to the First Congress, on June 8, 1789 saying:

> "* * * if all power is subject to abuse, then it is possible that the abuse of the powers of the General Government may be guarded against in a more secure manner than is now done * * *"
> (1 Annals of Congress 432)

Answering the argument that a Bill of Rights was unnecessary because the Federal Government was one of enumerated powers Madison went on to say:

> "It is true, the powers of the General Government are circumscribed, they are directed to particular objects; but even if Government keeps within those limits, it has certain discretionary powers with respect to the means, which may admit of abuse to a certain extent * * *," referring as had Jefferson explicitly to the necessary and proper clause (Id. at 438).

To guard against the possibility of regulation of speech and press by resort to construction of the enumerated powers Madison stated that:

> "* * * the great object in view is to limit and qualify the powers of Government, by excepting out of the grants of power those cases in which the Government ought not to act * * *" (Id. at 437)

And after the House had adopted the restraints on Congressional power prohibiting the Federal Government from abridging freedom of the press, which formed the basis of the First Amendment, Madison said:

> "The right of freedom of speech is secured; the liberty of the press is expressly declared to be beyond the reach of Government." (Id. at 738)

It is thus plain that the purpose of the First Amendment was to prohibit Congress from resorting to any delegated power or "necessary and proper" theory as a basis for authority for regulation of speech or press, and this, of course, is what the words of the First Amendment state as clearly as words can state anything:

> "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press."

Madison, indeed, early had occasion to reiterate this fact, when he said, during the discussion of the Alien & Sedition Acts:

"Under any other construction of the Amendment relating to the press than that it declares the press to be wholly exempt from the power of Congress the Amendment could neither be said to correspond with the desire expressed by a number of the states nor be calculated to extend the ground of public confidence in the Government." (Elliott, The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 and 1799 (1832), as quoted in Hart, op. cit., p. 423.)

(2) The purpose of the First, Ninth and Tenth Amendments is subverted if speech and press can be regulated by the Federal Government as incidents to exercise of the commerce, postal or importation powers.

It is apparent that the First Amendment's prohibition becomes meaningless if the power which it most explicitly denies to Congress can be wielded as an auxiliary of one of the enumerated powers. The command of the First Amendment cannot be effective unless it is construed to subtract from each such enumerated power of Congress any authority to regulate speech or press.

It has been recognized since the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1 (1824), that the commerce power is restricted by the "plain terms" of "limitations * * * prescribed in the Constitution." Congress may not in the course of regulating commerce impair the rights of speech or press. National Labor Relations Board v. Ford Motor Co., 114 F. 2d 905, cert. denied 312 U. S. 716 (1941).

Likewise, in Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board, 301 U. S. 103 (1937), although the majority found no impairment of free speech in the specific situation litigated, the underlying doctrine of Constitutional law which the Court applied was stated by the dissent as follows:

> "* * * Those liberties enumerated in the First Amendment are guaranteed without qualification, the object and effect of which is to put them in a category apart and make them incapable of abridgement by any process of law * * * (301 U. S. 103, 135)
> "The grants of the Constitution always are to be read in the light of the restrictions. Thus, the exercise of the power to make laws on the subject of bankruptcies, the exercise of the war powers, of the power to tax, of the power to exclude aliens, or of the power to regulate commerce, is each subject to the qualified restrictions of the Fifth Amendment * * * as each, also, is subject, so far as appropriate, to the unqualified restrictions of the First." (301 U. S. 103, 136)

It is equally clear that the First Amendment restricts what can be done under the postal power. This Court, in Hannegan v. Esquire, 327 U.S. 146 (1946), has approved the doctrines expounded by Justices Holmes and Brandeis in dissenting opinions in United States, ex rel. Milwaukee S.D. Pub. Co. v. Burleson, 255 U. S. 407 (1920):

> "* * * [T]he postal power, like all its other powers, is subject to the limitations of the Bill of Rights * * * Congress may not, through its postal police power, put limitations upon the freedom of the press which if directly attempted would be unconstitutional. This court also stated in Ex parte Jackson, that 'liberty of circulation is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing* * *' " (Brandeis, J., Id. at 430.)

and that:

> "The United States may give up the Post Office when it sees fit; but while it carries it on the use of the mails is almost as much a part of free speech as the right to use our tongues. * * *" (Holmes, J., Id. at 437.)

To the same effect see Ex Parte Jackson, 96 U. S. 727 (1877); Pike v. Walker, 121 F 2d 37, cert. denied, 314 U. S. 625 (1941).

Indeed, early in the history of the Republic, the restriction on the postal power necessarily resulting from the First Amendment was dramatically asserted, when President Jackson asked for a law prohibiting the use of the mails for publications intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection. The Senate refused so to legislate. Senator Calhoun, in the Committee Report said:

> "The committee fully concur with the President * * * as to the evil and its highly dangerous tendency, and the necessity of arresting it.
> "After the most careful and deliberate investigation, they have been constrained to adopt the conclusion that Congress has not the power to pass such a law * * *
> "In the discussion on the point, the Committee do not deem it necessary to inquire whether the right to pass such a law can be derived from the power to establish post offices and post roads * * * The jealous spirit of liberty which characterized our ancestors at the period when the constitution was adopted, forever closed the door by which the right might be implied from any of the granted powers, or any other source, if there be any other. The Committee refer to the amended article of the constitution which, among other things, provides that Congress shall pass no law which shall abridge the liberty of the press—a provision which interposes, as will be hereafter shown, an insuperable objection to the measure recommended by the president * * *"

S. Rep. 118, 24th Cong., 1st Sess. 1-3 (1836)

This view was concurred in by Senators from both North and South (all men raised during the formative period immediately after the adoption of the First Amendment). See in particular comments of Webster, Clay and Davis, and debates, passim, Cong. Globe, 24th Cong., 1st Sess. 36, 150, 164, 165, 347, 348, 351, 354, 539.

It was not until 1825 that the Congress declared the postal service a monopoly and no longer permitted private competition (4 Stat. 102).

Indeed one notes that for almost a century after the adoption of our Constitution no Congress presumed upon the powers of the States to invoke the postal or interstate commerce powers in order to regulate the flood of scurrility which filled the newspapers of the nineteenth century. Scurrility of that era was as objectionable as "obscenity" in ours but Congress preferred to endure scurrility rather than to attempt to arrogate to itself a Federal power which it did not have.

In the Tariff Act of 1842 Congress for the first time applied the label "obscene" to material. Act of Aug. 30, 1842, 27th Cong., 2d Sess., 5 Stat. 566. The statute prohibited the importation of "obscene prints, paintings, lithographs, engravings and transparencies", but excluded books and other printed textual matter from the ambit of that prohibition. This even though in this same tariff act a tariff was levied on books. Thus the Congress recognized the same limitation in 1842 when examining the power over foreign commerce as it had recognized in 1836 when dealing with the postal power. In that era of the development of the Printed Arts, Congress had not yet come to realize that both Pictures and Books fall in the same sacred area of Ideas Qua Ideas.

(d) Power over speech and press is in the States alone.

The First Amendment imposed a limit on Federal power. The rights of the people and State powers not granted to the Federal government were explicitly reserved by the Ninth and Tenth Amendments. Such reservation was made explicit because the States were apprehensive of the abuse of power by the national government. As the constitutional historian Charles Warren has commented, opposition to ratification of the Constitution stemmed from > "their profound belief that it was intended and framed to bring about a consolidation and ultimate destruction of the States and State sovereignty."

> (The Making of The Constitution, 753.)

To allay these fears, specific limits on Federal power were devised by the Bill of Rights. The States alone were given the power to balance the interests of free speech and press against the demands of morality. Yet the Federal government now claims just such authority. Mr. Justice Frankfurter has recently reminded us it was Jefferson's view that the Federal government had no such power:

> "* * * [T]he gravamen of the attack in the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions against the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 was that they infringed on the rights of the states and were promotive of 'a general consolidated government.' It deserves to be recalled that even Jefferson attributed to the states the power which he denied to the federal government. 'Nor does the opinion of the unconstitutionality and consequent nullity of that law—the [Sedition Act]', he wrote * * * 'remove all restraint from the overwhelming torrent of slander which is confounding all vice and virtue, all truth and falsehood in the US. The power to do that is fully possessed by the several state legislatures. * * * While we deny that Congress have a right to control the freedom of the press, we have ever asserted the right of the states, and their exclusive right, to do so.' "

And this was the view generally held by Republicans opposing the Sedition Act. They

"* * * regarded the punishment of libels and seditious speech and writings as a province of the states rather than of the Federal government. Nathaniel Macon declared that 'the liberty of the press was sacred'—but he meant only as against the Federal government, not against the states. Indeed, as he added, 'the states have complete power on the subject.' "

(Miller, Crisis in Freedom, 168-169 (1951).)

This viewpoint, so strongly expressed by Thomas Jefferson and others of our earlier statesmen is fortified by examination of the record of the First Congress.

(1) An Amendment to forbid State regulation of speech and press was rejected.

When Madison presented the draft of the Bill of Rights to the First Congress he proposed two separate provisions to deny authority over the rights of speech and press—one running against the general government, one against the States. The House adopted limits on both Federal and State power, the State provision reading:

"The equal rights of conscience, the freedom of speech or of the press, and the right of trial by jury in criminal cases, shall not be infringed by any state."

(1 Annals of Congress 755)

The amendment restricting the States failed of adoption in the Senate. The ground on which the proposal was opposed in the House by Mr. Tucker of Virginia was:

> "It will be much better to leave the state governments to themselves, and not to interfere with them more than we already do * * *" (Id., at 756)

As a result of the action of the Senate, the First Amendment, a clear restriction of the power of Congress, was presented to and adopted by the States. But the power of the States remained unimpaired.

(2) The Ninth and Tenth Amendments reiterate State power.

Just as they feared that the absence of delegated power over speech and press would not without more explicit prohibition suffice to prevent Federal encroachment, the drafters of the Bill of Rights considered a positive declaration of reserved powers imperative. The Ninth and Tenth Amendments were designed to achieve this purpose, to make explicit that the reverse of the coin—restriction on Congressional power—was reaffirmation of State power. Thus, as expressed by Mr. Hartly on the floor of the House:

> "It had been asserted in the convention of Pennsylvania, by the friends of the Constitution, that all the rights and powers that were not given to the Government, were retained by the states and the people thereof. This was also his opinion, but as four or five states had required to be secured in those rights by an express declaration in the Constitution, he was disposed to gratify them. * * *" (Id., at 732)

And Madison said:

> "I find, from looking into the amendments proposed by the state conventions, that several are particularly anxious that it should be declared in the Constitution, that the powers not therein delegated should be reserved to the several states. Perhaps other words may define this more precisely than the whole of the instrument now does. I admit they may be deemed unnecessary; but there can be no harm in making such a declaration, if gentlemen will allow that the fact is as stated. I am sure I understand it so, and do therefore propose it." (Id., at 441)

By adoption of the Ninth and Tenth Amendments, therefore, it was determined that the States and the States alone had the power to regulate speech and press.

The basic differences which were intended between State and Federal functions as to speech and the press were indicated by Mr. Justice Jackson in his dissenting opinion in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U. S. 250 (1952), where Justice Jackson stated:

> "The inappropriateness of a single standard for restricting State and Nation is indicated by the disparity between their functions and duties in relation to those freedoms. Criminality of defamation is predicated upon power either to protect the private right to enjoy integrity of reputation or the public right to tranquility. Neither of these are objects of federal cognizance except when necessary to the accomplishment of some delegated power, such as protection of interstate commerce.
> "When the Federal Government puts liberty of press in one scale, it has a very limited duty to personal reputation or local tranquility to weigh against it in the other. But state action affecting speech or press can and should be weighed against and reconciled with these conflicting social interests.

> "For these reasons I should not, unless clearly required, confirm to the Federal Government such latitude as I think a State reasonably may require for orderly government of its manifold concerns."

The States have power over and responsibility for moral good order—accordingly there is State power to determine the limits on speech or press which morality may require. But the power and responsibility is that of the States alone; this is not a function of the national government (Id., at 294). Cf. Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U. S. 319 (1937); Gitlow v. New York, 268 U. S. 652 (1925) (Dissenting opinions of Holmes and Brandeis, JJ.) (But see limitation noted in Point III).

(3) Nationwide standards for judging "obscenity" do not exist.

The wisdom of our Federal structure becomes apparent when we consider the anomalous results of an abuse of that structure—Federal obscenity legislation. Each State has enacted a complex of laws governing individual morals; the pattern of these laws varies in accordance with local custom and tradition. Societal mores and laws governing marriage, divorce, non-marital relations, profanity and other aspects of human activity which are components of the basic concepts of morality can and do vary from State to State.

The "mores of the community"—the standard against which the cases tell us "obscenity" must be tested—are inevitably the result of the interaction of these and other local factors. Within a given state there is perhaps basis for distilling a community attitude. But what possible basis is there for postulating "community mores" coextensive with the entire United States? In the variety lies our cultural wealth.

In a Southern state, where miscegenation laws are enforced, a description of interracial social activities might be deemed immoral; the same description be wholly inoffensive to a community in the North. Artistic expression considered shocking in remote rural areas may be deemed passé in large urban centers. On the other hand, everyday occurrences in the stables or the fields may shock those who are unfamiliar with animal husbandry. The diversity of mores and folkways in our many States safeguards us against a stultifying conformity. In aid of this diversity the Constitution must be read to proscribe the imposition of such conformity by Congressional fiat in the area of "obscenity". Facilities of travel and communication are the instruments of uniformity.

The simple fact is that as concerns moral attitudes, there is no national "community" and no basis in our Constitutional scheme for the development of any nationally uniform standard. The idea of a uniform nationwide consensus of moral values is a disturbing fiction particularly if imposed. So also was the fiction of Federal "common law" which was prophetically designated by Justice Holmes, in his dissent in Black & White Taxicab v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab, 276 U. S. 518 (1927) where at p. 534 he reminded the Court of the Federal judiciary's "unconstitutional assumption of powers * * * which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct." The fiction of Federal general law was later held to be an unconstitutional basis of Federal judicial power in Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64 (1938). I suggest to the Court that the fiction of a national community of moral attitudes is equally an unconstitutional basis for Federal power.

(4) Federal obscenity law interferes with the power of the States to mold the moral standards of the community.

The Federal statutes purport to determine what printed matter may be mailed from a point in a given State to a destination which is within that State, in another State or in a foreign country; what may be received in a State of destination for distribution in that State; and what may be transported by common carrier from one State to another. As a result a Federal jury in New York may ban from the mails printed matter addressed to citizens of New Mexico, even though the State of New Mexico is wholly willing to permit its circulation there. Clearly the sovereign power of the State of New Mexico is infringed if such printed matter is adjudicated non-mailable under Federal law. Such a result is in clear violation of the First Amendment, which was intended to exclude Federal regulation of speech and press in this area.

The result is even more striking if we consider an instance in which the State itself—through the instrumentality, for example of a State university—may be prevented by Federal law from bringing literature into the State. This is not a remote possibility: "obscenity" prosecutions have been brought based upon educational literature dealing with sexual relations, which literature might well be used by State agencies. (United States v. Dennett, 39 F. 2d 564 (1930); Walker v. Popenoe, 149 F. 2d 511 (1945).)

More important, and indeed all important, is the valued use of our 48 separate experimental laboratories—our sovereign states—48 geographic areas evidencing varying cultural attitudes toward matters sexual; areas which have their highest value in these terms rather than in economic or geographic dimensions. To impress one uniform censor on these varying folkways cannot be consistent with the concept of a Federal Government. The Federal concept imbedded in the Constitution demands the enrichment of comparative judgments and an emotional and spiritual free enterprise.

The needed diversity is easily illustrated. One need only look at the wide gap between the culture—Irish overlaid on Puritan—of New York and Boston which bespeaks a totally different standard of acceptance or rejection of matters sexual than does the Latin folkway of New Orleans. For example, also, one may note the conflicting pronouncements on the morality of the same book or motion picture which are made by civic or religious leaders in different localities throughout the nation. But all these variations pay tribute to the concept of Federalism in the Constitution and demand the persistence of that concept in matters of the mind. In this area, this Court has ever been cognizant of what in the vernacular is called "States rights", the concept that in a nation so vast the Founding Fathers negated in the Constitution any theory of a nationwide control of matter of the mind.

This area is removed from Federal power. The sedition area may even be preempted to the Federal Government while "merchandise words" may reside in State and Federal control.

POINT III

The power residing in the states over speech and press is not beyond all federal control.

This Court, as the ultimate guardian of the guarantees of the First Amendment, not only has the duty to enjoin any unlawful abridgement by the Federal Government of such guarantee; it also has the duty to the people of the Republic to protect against any attempt by the States to impose unreasonable restraints upon freedom of speech and press. Such is the command of the Fourteenth Amendment.

While it is recognized that the States possess the power to legislate with respect to the mores of the community, it must not be overlooked that such legislation is subject to the test of compliance with the First Amendment. The Fourteenth Amendment is the instrument for effectively protecting the people against the power of any State to tamper with their rights in speech and press. Upon its proclamation was finally satisfied the demand of Madison and other members of the First Congress for the addition to the Bill of Rights of a specific prohibition applicable to the States, against their abridgement of the First Amendment freedoms.

Just as the Federal authority has the Constitutional duty to prevent the establishment of non-republican institutions in the States flowing from the guarantee of a republican form of government, so also the National Government has the Constitutional power, and indeed the duty, to protect the people from encroachments by the States against the freedoms of speech and press. This Court must continue to invalidate unconstitutional limitations of speech and press imposed by the States. Should this Court not carve out as unabridgeable the idea qua idea area discussed in Point I the States may in the future find themselves in a position where they may desire to invoke Federal aid in the maintenance of Constitutionally approved local standards. Such Federal assistance has a precedent; it was obtained in support of local standards governing the consumption of liquors within a given State. As a State may prefer to remain dry despite the fact that its neighbors consume liquors, so likewise a State may prefer not to have its citizens receive certain "obscene" printed or visual materials which are transmitted from another State but in the State of delivery are lawfully banned. In such circumstance, the State of delivery may call upon the Federal government for assistance. Cf. James Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland R. Co., 242 U.S. 311 (1917).

The Court is undoubtedly aware of an analogous provision of the Postal Regulations whereby the most local authority, the parent, may invoke the aid of the postal authorities in order to control the delivery of mail to his child. (See Post Office Circular 2, 12-1-54 154.22).

POINT IV

If the Federal Government does possess power in this area, the Federal obscenity statute is unconstitutional in that it violates the First and Fifth Amendments.

(a) Freedom of expression is the rule.

Even if Federal power over the subject matter of speech and the press be conceded, the statute supporting the indictment in this case is unconstitutional under the First Amendment. Through a complex of obscenity laws as noted in Point II the government has imposed direct regulation over the contents of the media of expression. Such power, it is well established, may be exerted only under exceptional circumstances.

> "The basic principles of freedom of speech and the press, like the First Amendment's command, do not vary. These principles make freedom of expression the rule." (Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495) (1952); See also Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U. S. 242 (1936); Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516 (1944); Winters v. New York, 333 U. S. 507 (1948).

A narrow category of such exceptions has been recognized by the Supreme Court. These were summarized in this case below by Judge Frank, concurring as follows:

> "Any statute authorizing governmental interference (whether by 'prior restraint' or punishment) with free speech or free press runs counter to the First Amendment, except when the government can show that the statute strikes at words which are likely to incite to a breach of the peace, or with sufficient probability tend either to the overthrow of the government by illegal means or to some other overt anti-social conduct." 237 F. 2d at 802.

There is as is set forth in the Appendix to this Brief ground to hold that the anti-social conduct aimed at has not been identified and that publications considered to be obscene do not lead to any identified anti-social conduct.

A publication may be constitutionally suppressed only if the government sustains the burden of proving that it contains material which incites to anti-social conduct sufficiently dangerous to justify the exceptional remedy of suppressing free speech. The government must prove clear and substantial danger of anti-social conduct and must make a showing of high probability that such anti-social conduct would take place if the publication were not suppressed.

> "In each case [courts] must ask whether the gravity of the evil, discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." (Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494).

The government has the burden of justifying any restraint on speech or press. Burstyn v. Wilson, supra; Thomas v. Collins, supra; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624; Dennis v. United States, supra. There is no presumption of the constitutionality of a statute which impinges on these freedoms; on the contrary "the State has a heavy burden." (Burstyn v. Wilson, supra). Moreover * * * "When legislation appears on its face to affect the use of speech, press or religion, and when its validity depends on the existence of facts not proved, their existence should not be presumed." (Busey v. District of Columbia, 138 F. (2) 592 (1943).

In the Appendix to this Brief we have set forth an analysis of sociological and psychological data indicating the absence of any causal relationship between reading sexually stimulating material and overt anti-social conduct. This was also the conclusion of Judge Frank who, after an exhaustive study of this question, found in this case that:

> "To date there exists, I think, no thoroughgoing studies by competent persons which justifies the conclusion that normal adults' reading or seeing of the 'obscene' probably induces anti-social conduct. Such studies do conclude that so complex and numerous are the causes of sexual vice that it is impossible to assert with any assurance that 'obscenity represents a ponderable causal factor in sexually deviant adult behavior. 'Although the whole subject of obscenity censorship hinges upon the unproved assumption that 'obscene' literature is a significant factor in causing sexual deviation from the community standard, no report can be found of a single effort to genuine research to test this assumption by singling out as a factor for study the effect of sex literature upon sexual behavior.' What little competent research has been done, points definitely in a direction precisely opposite to that assumption.
> "Alpert reports that, when, in the 1920s, 409 women college graduates were asked to state in writing what things stimulated them sexually they answered thus: 218 said "Man"; 95 said books; 40 said drama; 29 said dancing; 18 said pictures; 9 said music. Of those who replied that the source of their sex information came from books, not one specified a 'dirty' book as the source. Instead, the books listed were: The Bible, the dictionary, the encyclopedia, novels from Dickens to Henry James, circulars about venereal diseases, medical books, and Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic.' "

For the full statistical analysis of these figures, see Ernst and Seagle, To the Pure . . ., Chapt. XII, An Appeal to Science, pp. 234ff. (1928).

(b) "Obscene" cannot be defined.

Due process of law requires that a defendant know with some certainty of what he is accused (see (f) below). The case law of obscenity is remarkable for its failure to define what is supposed to be prohibited. Many courts and commentators have attempted to define the concept; all have inevitably failed. An objective student of the precedents cannot fail to agree with Judge Frank that:

> "If anyone regards as precise the standard in the obscenity statute, he cannot have read the pertinent cases." (Roth v. Goldman, 172 F. (2) 788 (1949).)

To the same effect see Parmelee v. United States, 113 F. (2) 729 (1940); Bantam Books v. Melko, 14 N. J. 524; United States v. Roth, 237 F. (2) 796 (1956).

See also State v. Lerner, 51 O. L. A. 321 (Ohio 1948), 81 N. E. (2) 282, 286 (1948).

> "Obscenity is not a legal term. It cannot be defined so that it will mean the same to all people, all the time, everywhere. Obscenity is very much a figment of the imagination—an indefinable something in the minds of some and not in the minds of others, and it is not the same in the minds of the people of every clime and country, nor the same today that it was yesterday or will be tomorrow."

The reasons for the inability of the courts to define obscenity have been aptly diagnosed by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Parmelee v. United States, supra, where the court said:

> "Probably the fundamental reason why the word 'obscene' is not susceptible of exact definition is that such intangible moral concepts as it purports to connote vary in meaning from one period to another."

(c) "Obscenity" depends on an infinity of variables which render the law completely uncertain.

As a result of their inability to define "obscene" the courts have, in effect, delegated the problem to the triers of fact. Juries or judges determine the extent to which "intangible moral concepts" shall be invoked to suppress rights guaranteed by the First Amendment. As Judge Hand has stated "obscenity is a function of many variables * * * and the verdict of the jury is * * * really a small bit of legislation ad hoc * * *" (United States v. Levine, 83 F. (2) 156 (1936)).

Under the Federal obscenity laws a very large number of variables may affect the fate of a publication. There are no standards adequate to prevent the trier of fact in any particular case from basing his judgment on his own subjective reactions. Preliminary to submission of the case is the determination to prosecute which, like the ultimate verdict, is bound by no precise limitations, and can, of course, be made on the basis of wholly extraneous factors. When the case goes to the triers of fact the ultimate result becomes anyone's guess, since the triers have virtually unlimited discretion to determine the law. In the first instance the jury must invest with content such terms as "obscene", "salacious", "immoral", "corrupt" or any other of the synonyms adverted to by the courts as substitutes for judicial definition. Here is an immediate invitation to punishment on the basis of the subjective reactions of the jury.[1] Second, the jury must evaluate the

[1] Thus, Chafee, in Government and Mass Communications (1947) comments, at page 210:

> "The subject, by its very nature, includes a large element of irrationality * * * When the facts themselves are necessarily fraught with contradictory emotions, it is hopeless to expect officials and judges to be coldly reasonable in dealing with literary representation of those facts."

publication against the standards of the community. Here again, there is uncontrolled opportunity for subjective judgment.[2] Third, since the courts admit that moral concepts change with time, the result in the case of any given work depends on when the prosecution is initiated. Fourth, since under federal law the work may be prosecuted anywhere in the United States, the result depends on where the prosecution is brought.

Thus a publisher confronted with the federal obscenity laws lacks even a remote basis for evaluating whether a work may be held obscene. There is no rational body of judicial decision; there is no basis for predicting the subjective reactions of the jury; accidents of time or geography may become determinative. He may know that certain works have been condemned in certain places. But he also knows that the same works have been cleared—in different places or at a different time. He has no means of guessing where or when his publication will be prosecuted, what the mood of the community from which a jury will be drawn may be, whether the jury will reflect what he deems to be prevailing moral standards and in any case whose moral standards they will be. In other words, he is not in a position to make even an informed guess.

Obscenity is wholly different from other fields where defendants must risk the reactions of a jury, such as

[2]Judge Frank noted, in his concurring opinion in this case below that:

> "If, in a jury case, the trial judge does not direct a verdict or enter a judgment of acquittal, the jury exercises the censorship power. Courts have said that a jury has a peculiar aptitude as a censor of obscenity, since, representing a cross-section of the community, it knows peculiarly well the average 'common conscience' of the time. Yet no statistician would conceivably accept the views of a jury—twelve persons chosen at random—as a fair sample of community attitudes on such a subject as obscenity. A particular jury may voice the 'moral sentiments' of a generation ago, not of the present time."

criminal negligence. In the instance of obscenity not only is virtually every element a variable, but the defendant's fate actually rests on the subjective evaluation by the triers of the facts of "intangible, moral concepts." The trier of facts does not evaluate conduct against a framework of objective events and apply the standard of the reasonable man. Here the triers of fact determine what should or should not be circulated.

As Judge Frank pointed out in this case below, the law authorizes "hundreds of divers jury-legislatures with discrepant beliefs, to decide whether or not to enact hundreds of divers statutes interfering with freedom of expression."

Even a cursory glance at the modern history of "obscenity" demonstrates how the purported standard is variously and contradictorily applied. Thus, the novel "Ulysses" was found importable as non-obscene in 1934 (United States v. One Book, 72 F(2) 705 (1934)); previously booksellers had been convicted under the New York Penal Law for selling it.

The novel "Memoirs of Hecate County" was found obscene in a criminal trial in Los Angeles in September, 1946; a bookseller indicted for selling the same book was acquitted in San Francisco in December, 1946. The publisher of the book was criminally convicted in New York in October, 1946 and the book was found non-obscene and therefore importable by administrative action of the Customs Service in California in 1954.

Similarly, the novel "God's Little Acre" was held "obscene" in Massachusetts in 1950. It was held not to be obscene in New York in 1933 and in Pennsylvania in 1948 (See Attorney General v. "God's Little Acre", 326 Mass. 281 (1950)).

Nudist magazines have similarly been subjected to contradictory rulings in the courts. Thus, one lower federal court in the District of Columbia found magazines published by the nudist movement "not likely to promote lustful feelings or excite the sexual passions" (See Summerfield v. Sunshine Book Co. 221 F(2) 42 (1955).) Another federal district court subsequently found the magazines obscene (Sunshine Book Company v. Summerfield, 128 F. Supp. 564 (1955)), but was reversed on appeal by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia (Sunshine Book Company v. Summerfield, No. 12622, May 31, 1956).[3] During the same period a lower federal court in the Eastern District of Washington banned importation of certain foreign nudist magazines (United States v. 4200 Copies International Journal, 134 Fed. Supp. 490 (1955)) on reasoning comparable to that of the reversed decision of the District Court in the Sunshine Book case, op cit. supra.

It is notorious that in the field of federal administrative enforcement of obscenity laws there is wide discrepancy between rulings of the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department, although each agency is presumably charged with the same responsibility to ban "obscenity". The New Jersey Court has commented, with respect to the federal administrative picture:

> "Nowhere is the inconsistency of literary censorship more patent than in the federal field." (Bantam Books v. Melko, supra)

[3] Subsequently reargued before the full bench.

(e) The uncertainties of the obscenity laws render them void for vagueness under the Fifth Amendment.

On the basis of the foregoing it is submitted that the Federal obscenity statutes are unconstitutional definitions of criminal liability. The due process clause of the Fifth Amendment forbids imposition of criminal sanctions where liability is as dependent on chance as it is under these laws. As Mr. Justice Rutledge said in United States v. CIO, 335 U. S. 106 (1947) (dissenting opinion), "Blurred signposts to criminality will not suffice to create it."

This Court stated the requirements of due process in Winters v. New York (333 U. S. 507 (1948)) where a somewhat different but no more precise restraint on freedom of expression than is here involved was invalidated:

> "The standard of certainty in statutes punishing for offenses is higher than those depending primarily upon civil sanctions for enforcement. The crime 'must be defined with appropriate definiteness' * * * . There must be ascertainable standards of guilt. Men of common intelligence cannot be required to guess at the meaning of the enactment * * *."

Section 1461 does not measure up to these requirements. When the result depends on subjective determinations of juries, and on happenstance of history or geography, there is no "ascertainable standard of guilt." The statute involved in this case and the other obscenity statutes are classic examples of legislation whose meaning can not be guessed at even by men of common intelligence. They appear also to be precisely the type of legislation condemned by the Court in Herndon v. Lowry, supra, on the ground that it "licenses the jury to create its own standard in each case."

While the majority opinion in the Burstyn case and in Holmby Productions, Inc. v. Vaughn, 350 U. S. 870 (1955) rests on the principle that the standards there involved, one of which was "obscenity", were too uncertain to satisfy the First Amendment, their reasoning—that "unbridled censorship" was involved—is also applicable to the Fifth Amendment. If a standard permits "unbridled censorship" it does not define a crime with reasonable certainty.

(f) The rule of certainty is particularly important when First Amendment rights are affected.

Because the rights secured by the First Amendment are preferred in the constitutional scheme, and because they are particularly vulnerable to impairment by prosecution under loosely worded criminal statutes, this Court has subjected such laws to most careful scrutiny.

In the Winters case the Court held:

> "Although we are dealing with an aspect of a free press in its relation to public morals, the principles of unrestricted distribution of publications admonish us of the particular importance of a maintenance of standards of certainty in the field of criminal prosecution for violation of statutory prohibitions against distribution."

See also Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359 (1930); Herndon v. Lowry, supra; Kunz v. New York, 340 U. S. 290 (1950).

Under this doctrine there is clearly applicable to the standard "obscene" Justice Frankfurter's statement in his concurring opinion in Burstyn v. Wilson, supra, that it:

> "remains too uncertain to justify constraining the creative efforts of the imagination by fear of pains and penalties imposed by a necessarily subjective censorship."

CONCLUSION

Along the lines of the Constitutional philosophy above set forth, the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit should be reversed.

APPENDIX

Memorandum on the Lack of Causal Connection Between Exposure to Printed and Visual Materials and Participation in Anti-Social Conduct or Behavior

1. PRESENT STATE OF MAN'S KNOWLEDGE OF SUCH CAUSAL RELATIONSHIP

Only during the last several years have the effects of printed materials on readers been studied to any extent by social scientists. No study has been made which has shown causal connection between exposure to "obscene" printed and visual materials and participation in anti-social conduct or behavior. Moreover:

> "Although the whole subject of obscenity hinges upon the unproved assumption that 'obscene' literature is a significant factor in causing sexual deviation from the community standard, no report can be found of a single effort at genuine research to test this assumption by singling out as a factor for study the effect of sex literature upon sexual behavior." (Lockhart and McClure, "Obscenity and The Courts," 20 L. & Contemp. Prob., 587, 595.)

Nor has it been demonstrated that youthful readers (who are often presumed to be most susceptible to influence) are affected by such material. Indeed, there has been a notable absence of results showing that any such effect exists.

> "Those who would ban books argue that particularly books make for juvenile delinquency or crime, induce violence and sadism, corrupt taste, promote sexual perversion, distort human values, subvert political loyalties, provoke disrespect for the law, produce demeaning stereotypes of groups and, in general, make sin even more attractive than it ordinarily is. When evidence is put forward to support these claims, it is at best thin and questionable; more characteristically, it is entirely absent." (Richard McKeon, Robert K. Merton, and Walter Gellhorn, The Freedom to Read, 76 (1956).)

Where an effect is so out of proportion to its supposed cause the conclusion must inevitably be that other factors are of greater force.

"We start with the proposition that an interest in pornography is seemingly not the molder of a man's personality but the reflection of it. Indeed, certain psychological experiments suggest that one who finds pornographic elements in allegedly obscene books is very likely to discover them also in apparently innocuous books, through a process of self-selection and emphasis that the reader himself brings to the words. The same process of self-selection—this tendency to read and see what accords with pre-existing interests—probably controls the effects of reading as well as the determination of what will be read. The fact that 'sex maniacs' may read pornography does not mean that they became what they are because of their reading, but that their reading became what it is because of them. Their personality, according to modern scientific findings that confirm a proposition stated long ago by the Jesuit fathers, was probably basically formed before they ever learned to read." (Walter Gellhorn, Individual Freedom and Governmental Restraints, 61-2 (1956).)

This conclusion as it applies to the effect of "obscene" printed materials, is amply supported by the two classes of evidence into which the existing research may be divided: (1) that of anti-social behavior and sexual stimulation, showing neither to be caused by printed materials, and (2) that of printed materials, showing them to cause neither sexual stimulation nor anti-social behavior. We may set aside for the moment the question of whether or not sexual stimulation is in itself a cause of anti-social behavior, an even more dubious proposition.

The sources of anti-social behavior, like the effects of reading, have been studied intensively in juveniles on the assumption that the youthful individual is more susceptible to influence than the adult and more likely to show such influence if it exists. Special attention has been given by a Congressional Committee to the relationship between juvenile delinquency and the mass media—such as television, motion pictures, and comic books—and much testimony has been elicited from social scientists and other experts in the field (see Hearings and Reports of the Subcommittee to Investigate Juvenile Delinquency, 84th Congress, Reports Nos. 62, 1466 and 2055). The effect of the testimony is to suggest great doubt that the media—especially the printed media, in this case the comic book—have a primary or causative effect in producing anti-social behavior. "Majority opinion," the Committee reported, "seems inclined to the view that it is unlikely that the reading of crime and horror comics would lead to delinquency in a well-adjusted and normally law-abiding child." (Senate Report No. 62, 84th Congress, 1st Session, p. 12).

In communications to the Committee, many experts went further:

> "* * * In 25 years of practice, which includes 10 years majoring in juvenile and adult courtwork, I have never been able to pin down a definite major fundamental causal influence between crime, violence, etc., as depicted in movies, cartoons, books, or TV, and the offensive behavior encountered in delinquency * * *." (Dr. George M. Lott, University Psychiatrist, State College, Pa., June 1, 1955).

"* * * To attack the television programs and the comic books appears to me to be rather like closing the stable door after the horse has escaped * * *." (Dr. Maier I. Tuchler, San Francisco, Cal., May 24, 1955).

"* * * It is my feeling that this literature and these programs serve a positive purpose in permitting the child or youth to live through emotionally, in a vicarious manner, his aggressive needs. If the disturbed child or youth who acts out his hostility in a violent manner were not exposed to these media, some other environmental influence would tend to provoke this hostility * * *." (Dr. Samuel R. Kesselman, Neuropsychiatrist, Newark, N. J., May 25, 1955).

This last opinion—that printed material with what may superficially appear to be anti-social content may actually serve to prevent anti-social behavior rather than encourage it—is shared by Dr. Lauretta Bender, Professor of Clinical Psychiatry, New York University, College of Medicine.

"As has been well stated by J. Moodie, normal, well-adjusted children with active minds, given insufficient outlets or in whom natural drives for adventure are curbed, will demand satisfaction in the form of some excitement. Their desire for blood and thunder is a desire to solve the problems of the threats of aggression against themselves or those they love, as well as the problem of their own impulses to retaliate and punish in like form. The comics may be said to offer the same type of mental catharsis to its readers that Aristotle claimed was an attribute of the drama * * *. That they supply a real need for the child there can be no doubt * * *.

> "* * * We repeat that comics are representative of the folklore of the times, spontaneously given to and received by children, serving at the same time as a means of helping them solve the individual and sociological problems appropriate to their own lives." (Dr. Lauretta Bender, A Dynamic Psychopathology of Childhood, 227, 229, 230 (1954).)

Moreover, in groups where both delinquency and comic-reading are found—as shown by a study of 250 New York City school boys—research reveals no correlation between the two. (Herbert S. Lewin, "Facts and Fears about the Comics," Nation's Schools, 46-8, 52.) In a report to the New York State Temporary Commission on Youth and Delinquency, Children's Court Judge George W. Smythe, president of the National Probation and Parole Association, submitted a list of twenty contributing causes of juvenile delinquency ranked by the number of cases in which they had appeared. No communication media, let alone reading material are mentioned; reading difficulty is included but ranks eighteenth. (New York Times, September 2, 1955). This finding is fully confirmed by a summary of studies quoted by Judge Frank:

> "(1) Scientific studies of juvenile delinquency demonstrate that those who get into trouble, and are the greatest concern to the advocates of censorship, are far less inclined to read than those who do not become delinquent. The delinquents are generally the adventurous type, who have little use for reading and other nonactive entertainments. Thus, even assuming that reading sometimes has an adverse effect upon moral behavior, the effect is not likely to be substantial, for those who are susceptible seldom read.
> "(2) Sheldon and Eleanor Glueck, who are among the country's leading authorities on the treatment and causes of juvenile delinquency, have recently published the results of a ten-year study of its causes. They exhaustively studied approximately 90 factors and influences that might lead to or explain juvenile delinquency; but the Gluecks gave no consideration to the type of reading material, if any were read by the delinquents. When those who know so much about the problem of delinquency among youth—the very group about whom the advocates of censorship are most concerned—conclude that what delinquents read has so little effect upon their conduct that it is not worth investigating in an exhaustive study of causes, there is good reason for serious doubts concerning the basic hypothesis on which obscenity censorship is dependent.

"(3) The many other influences in society that stimulate sexual desire are so much more frequent in their influence and so much more potent in their effect that the influence of reading is likely, at most, to be relatively insignificant in the composite of forces that lead an individual into conduct deviating from the community sex standards * * * And the studies demonstrating that sex knowledge seldom results from reading indicates the relative unimportance of literature in sexual thoughts and behavior as compared with other factors in society." (Appendix to concurrence in United States v. Roth, 237 F. (2) 796, at p. 813.)

The effect of printed materials even on impressionable children has not been shown even though the medium is universally available to them, consumed by them in large quantity, and direct in its emotional impact through bold color, pictorial simplicity, and highly dramatized content. Therefore, a fortiori, is it difficult to show such an effect on adults, who have been exposed to a much greater amount of experience and whose moral character, good or bad, has been more firmly molded.

This conclusion is further supported by the most important study of the subject, The Impact of Literature: A Psychological Discussion of Some Assumptions in the Censorship Debate, prepared for the American Book Publishers Council by Marie Jahoda and the staff of the Research Center for Human Relations, New York University, March 1, 1954. Dr. Jahoda finds that there "is little consensus on what constitutes a 'bad' book beyond the tautological statement that a 'bad' book is one that has a 'bad' effect," and that at the same time "assumptions made by various people on the effect of 'bad' books are often inconsistent with each other, unprecise and confusing." (The Impact of Literature, 16.) In summation she writes:

> "There is a large overlap in content matter between all media of mass communication. The daily press, television, movies, radio and fictional printed material all present their share of the so-called 'bad' material, varying in the degree of reality attached to these matters. It is virtually impossible to isolate the impact of one of these media on a population that is exposed to all of them. Some evidence suggests that the particular communications to which an individual exposes himself are probably in good part a matter of choice. The reader does not take in everything that is offered but mostly what he is predisposed to take. In the realm of attitudes, this means that adult people prefer to expose themselves to material which expresses attitudes they already hold. A conversion of attitudes by any of the mass media is indeed a rare event, if it occurs at all * * *" (The Impact of Literature, 44.)

Even if one assumes—and there is no evidence for such an assumption—that the stimulation of erotic thoughts and desires leads of itself to anti-social behavior, the few studies that have been made of such stimulation rarely show reading matter or printed materials to have caused it. A carefully conducted survey of a group of boys between the ages of 12 and 16 showed that 85 per cent had been aroused to the extent of "genital commotion" by such varied stimuli as carnival rides, playing a musical solo, fast car-driving, and seeing a column of marching soldiers. (Glenn V. Ramsey, "The Sexual Development of Boys," 56 American Journal of Psychology, 217, at 222-223 (1943). Kinsey, a noted authority in this field, also reports the effects of stimulation resulting from skiing, swimming, or sitting in hot sand. (Alfred C. Kinsey, Sexual Behavior in the Human Male, 164-5 (1948).)

Where reading plays any role whatever, it is likely to be one of information. In the classic study of twelve hundred unmarried women college graduates made by the Bureau of Social Hygiene of New York City, 218 reported that what they found the most stimulating sexually was, as might have been anticipated, the opposite sex. As for their sources of sex information, reading represented only six per cent of it, and among the books mentioned were the Bible, the dictionary, Shakespeare, a Lydia Pinkham advertisement, and Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic. (Morris L. Ernst and William Seagle, To the Pure * * *, 249-255 (1928).) Obviously, given the appropriate circumstances, nearly anything can be sexually stimulating. If a person "reads a book when his sensuality is low," as Judge Curtis Bok puts it, "he will yawn over it or find that its suggestibility leads him off on quite different paths. If he reads the Mechanics' Lien Act while his sensuality is high, things will stand between him and the printed page that have no business there." (Commonwealth v. Gordon, 66 Pa. Dist. & Co. R. 101, 137-38 (1949), aff'd 166 Pa. 120, 70 A. 2d 389 (1950).)

Erotic stimulation, in any event, is not of itself the agent of anti-social behavior. If it were, the prohibitions affecting obscenity would have to be extended to include the wide variety of stimulating agents we have mentioned, and many more.

> "I think no sane man thinks socially dangerous the arousing of normal sexual desires. Consequently, if reading obscene books has merely that consequence, Congress, it would seem, can constitutionally no more suppress such books than it can prevent the mailing of many other objects, such as perfumes, for example, which notoriously produce that result." (Roth v. Goldman, 172 F (2) 788, 792.)

Far from being anti-social, erotic stimulation is essential to the very existence of society. "Unless the human race is to vanish entirely, we can scarcely afford to regard the arousing of normal sexual desires as a social danger to be curbed at all costs." (Walter Gellhorn, Individual Freedom and Governmental Restraints, 59 (1956).)

One authority reports no examples whatever of sexual offenses stimulated by "obscene" matter. (Karpman, The Sexual Offender and His Offenses, 360 (1954).) It is a commonplace that at least the female half of the population is largely immune to stimulation of this kind.

> "* * * [A]s Kinsey makes clear, women are not particularly interested in certain kinds of sex behavior—such as exhibitionism, peeping, and circulating pornography—in which many males delight. The Indiana University researchers * * * explain this sex difference by pointing out that females are less aroused psychologically than are males." (Robert Veit Sherwin, "Female Sex Crimes," in Sex Life of the American Woman and the Kinsey Report, 177-8 (1954).)

Furthermore, it has often been observed by psychologists that the individuals most interested in printed material with erotic content are the ones least likely to engage in any overt act as a result of it. (Testimony of Dr. Albert Ellis in United States v. Roth, S.D.N.Y. C 148-9 at p. 365.) The most delinquent youths are least likely to be interested in any kind of reading; of the delinquent and emotionally disturbed children in a survey presented to the Boston Kefauver Hearings on Juvenile Delinquency, the great majority had already manifested their disturbance before the age at which they could read at all. Not erotic stimulation but its very opposite—the inability to be stimulated—is characteristically found in what society calls sexual deviants and purveyors of "obscenity." A study of virtually all of the sex offenders convicted in New Jersey between April, 1949 and June, 1950 revealed that, aside from those involved in statutory rape and incest, they tended to be sexually inhibited and repressed rather than overimpulsive or over-sexed. "All told, 54 per cent of those studied showed severe sexual inhibition; and high rates of inhibition were particularly found among those convicted of non-coital sex relations with a minor, exhibitory acts, and disseminating 'obscene' material." (Albert Ellis and Ralph Brancale, The Psychology of Sex Offenders, 93-5 (1956).)

Those who are most affected tend to be, not the delinquents, but the prudish and censorious individuals who typically initiate complaints against material they find "obscene." They, and not the delinquents, are the only persons who consistently respond to published "erotica" in such a manner as to indicate any cause-and-effect relationship:

"* * * [T]he local Comstock, who prowls the book stores and magazine stands searching for 'shocking passages' to point at in horror, alarm, and glee, finds exactly what he is looking for and would be disappointed if he did not * * * He is often an emotionally disturbed and intemperate person with a paranoid personality. His attention is focussed on smut, and since he looks for it, he finds it everywhere." (Lockhart and McClure, "Literature, The Law of Obscenity, and the Constitution," 38 Minn. Law Rev. 371-378 (1954).)

2. IRRATIONAL JUDICIAL ODDITIES EMPLOYED TO COMPENSATE FOR ABSENCE OF EVIDENCE OF CAUSAL RELATIONSHIP

The compulsion of man to try to explain or justify the occurrences of the world about him is his noblest characteristic and his gravest danger. In the absence of a method of inquiry which offers either a reasonable hypothesis or a scientifically tested cause and effect relationship resort is had to the process of rationalization. To secure acceptance a rationalization need meet no objective standards—the approbation of those forces in the community enjoying the power of suasion is sufficient. It is "judicial notice" at its worst.

It has therefore been normal and indeed inescapable for man, whether juror or judge, in the absence of knowledge showing a causal relationship between ideas and behaviour in the field of morals or sexual conventions, to evoke a rationalization as a substitute for constitutional standards. Since 1872 the judicial determination of obscenity has rested on a variety of conflicting unestablished subjective assumptions, including:

Appendix

1. Motive of the author. This is often invoked as an excuse for suppression or defense for freedom of his ideas. This obviously is a complete negation of any scrutiny of the effect on the reader; causal relationship is dispensed with. But assuming even that a given idea in print or picture can be shown to elicit anti-social behaviour, then surely an author with high motives can bring about the evil, and similarly an author with low motives, perhaps even intending to bring about such evil, can be ineffective.

2. Price. In many cases the price at which the book is sold is used as a test. By and large expensive books gain immunity thereby. The only validity of such testing factor lies in the presumption that the rich are incorruptible or are already corrupted, or that which is costly is therefore not tawdry. This is basically a cornerstone theory of an aristocratic society.

3. A greater measure of freedom for the daily press. A special and understandable sanctity of freedom for the daily and weekly press as distinguished from other printed formats seems to have been developed by our legislators and judges. Apparently it is assumed that books and magazines require the interposition of a censor between the author and the community, whereas the more readily available newspaper must be viewed under different standards. Perhaps the unwillingness to attack the newspaper is only an expression of fear on the part of the censorious that such an attack on a popular institution might lose to them the freedom to condemn other material.

4. Classics. In historic terms there is to be found an amusing conflict which leads to the grant of immunity from obscenity laws to so called classics. No one has yet determined how long an author must be dead before his work becomes a classic. We would appear to have developed a reverence for classics to the point where their obscenities can travel through our culture with impunity. An idea back of this absurdity may be that a person reading a classic becomes enveloped in a distinguished mood that eliminates the impact of sexual material from any effect on the gonads.

5. Isolated passages. A recent trend indicates that any book must be read as a whole and cannot be suppressed because an isolated passage is deemed offensive. If, as the censor contends, the community must suffer some antisocial behaviour germinated by the specific episode, then what matters it, the content of the surrounding material? This supposedly modern approach by our courts is in reality only an application of the de minimis concept, useful in other areas of life, but of doubtful value in a situation where the effect upon the mind of the reader is the vital question.

6. Recently there has been a scurrying about the bookshops and newsstands throughout our nation directed primarily toward format, namely: paper bound books. This accent on a new format is typical of man's historic approach to communication; the fear of Guttenberg's press compared to the quill, the fear of radio compared to the printed word, the fear of movies compared to the spoken word, all give evidence that each new technique of dissemination invites attack on the technique and not essentially on the extension of the available audience.

7. Protection of our women. Only recently has there been a trace of impact of the new knowledge produced by scientists that women are not affected as are men by sexual titillation in print; they are not attracted by the so-called pornographic. For decades it has been theorized that material must be suppressed in order to protect our women. In the light of the scientific investigation that has shown that print or pictures are clearly without sexual glandular behaviour impact on women, the rationale must find its resting place along with the other fictions, legal and moral, that until this century guarded and disabled them.

8. Until recently in fetching for an excuse to condemn, no distinction was made between the impact on children of fiction as compared to non-fiction. The attack in the main has been on fiction. Investigation may well, however, recognize that realism, particularly in the daily press, has a very different impact than has anything in the realm of fiction or escape literature. Sexual perversion or deviation portrayed as an historical event may impress the mind of an adult, as well as the child, in quite a different fashion than the equivalent material appearing as fiction.

9. There are certain areas of relief provided in our enforcement of obscenity statutes to prevent the courts from being held up to ridicule by the upper reaches of our culture. One notes, for example, the existence of so-called obscenity contained in the reported law cases; the collections of "pornography" amassed by some of the more important libraries; and the practice of sending so-called obscenity material stopped from importation into the United States, to the Library of Congress for use by the learned.

10. Educational materials. Exceptions have been created in the name of education for manuals of sex instruction. Detailed explanations and specific illustrations contained in such works are permitted to circulate while similar descriptive passages translated to the medium of fiction subject the work to the danger of prosecution.

11. Competing forms. One of the curious anomalies in the area of censorship has developed in recent years with the advent of radio and television broadcasting. The book banned in one jurisdiction is read over radio facilities; the film which failed to obtain the approval of the censor is televised—both may be received by the people of the locality which has forbidden their introduction. Similarly, those states and cities which pre-censor all motion pictures may never have the opportunity to review the televised film.

12. Courts, Customs and Postal authorities at times dip into a mirage of subjective sexual connotations as tests of obscenity. Among other tidbits so used: High heels, nudity as distinguished from nakedness, black stockings and bras as exciters of males, four letter Anglo-Saxon words as distinguished from euphemisms of same implication, explicit as compared to implicit excitements, etchings as compared to paintings, verse versus prose, shift from stockings on women at bathing beaches to bare legs at a later date in a changing mores, brown breasts as compared to white breasts, et cetera. A recent confusion appears since "filthy" in the statute implies repulsion, a force, if any, antithetical to excitement.

13. Privacy. Some among us contend that each citizen has, as a part of the protection afforded him by the community, a right of privacy not to be deluged with noxious material. The individual, it is urged, should not be compelled to suffer this burden. While there is no evidence as to the extent of the burden, this taxation of the sensibilities of the community is really of little importance. We are, in these States, constitutionally dedicated to the creed that each citizen must exercise the right of selection secured to him by the First Amendment to choose from among all the thoughts of the mind of man freely communicated to him, to establish, without the aid of government, his own level of taste. Immunization from offensive products of the press must, if needed, be self-imposed.

A valuable list of books suppressed in our culture and elsewhere can be found in Banned Books by Anne Lyon Haight, 1955. The time and locale and circumstances of censorship gives ample evidence of the gravamen of this Appendix.

3. SOCIETAL SCARS CREATED BY LACK OF CONSTITUTIONAL STANDARDS FOR CONTROL OF SEXUAL STIMULI

Just as it may be shown that the effects of a given piece of reading matter are unlikely to be harmful, it can also be shown that the effect of censorship is not only harmful in itself but the source of other harms. Censorship removes to the courtroom questions of aesthetic and moral judgment which the healthy society, if it is to remain healthy, must settle for itself. Only through voluntary action—as Milton most eloquently argued in the Areopagitica—can either an individual or society exercise its moral muscles. A noted contemporary theologian has also commented on the inappropriateness of confusing the two areas:

> "Officers of the law must operate under statutes which in this matter are, or ought to be, narrowly drawn. On the other hand, voluntary reform, precisely because it is voluntary, may be based on the somewhat broader categories of common-sense judgment." (John Courtney Murray, S.J., "The Bad Arguments Intelligent Men Make," America, November 3, 1956.)

The effect of censorship by law is to provide an arena for combat between social forces whose antagonisms are notoriously irrelevant to the social problems, such as they are, presented by the circulation of "pornography." The most familiar of these is "the fight between the literati and the philistines," as two legal scholars have put it, for aesthetic jurisdiction over book publishing. (Lockhart and McClure, 38 Minn. L. Rev. 295, 328-9 (1954).) Both parties to the dispute tend to treat the legal history of obscenity as a series of victories or defeats, located on a scale between liberality and license; and thus is further postponed any objective analysis and cure of whatever anti-social phenomena are involved.

It may also be said of censorship in matters pertaining to sex that it derives from those general social and cultural criteria that are frequently called, for lack of a better name, "Puritan." Even the proponents of censorship accept this label:

> "The ascendancy of Puritanism in England promoted a pious reserve in language as in conduct * * * The Victorian era was a time of literary restraint * * * It may be that the time has come for the pendulum to swing back again * * * a consummation devoutly to be wished." (Gathings Committee Report, p. 5.)

While this statement has the merit of recognizing that standards have changed, it fails to point out that historical perspective has increased our understanding of those earlier times. We now know that the Puritans were not so "puritan," and that the Victorians cultivated "pious reserve" more in theory than in practice. "Puritan" standards have indeed been in good part abandoned for the very reason that we have discovered them to have been largely a surface veneer and a source of hypocrisy. "Every censorship," as Harold Lasswell writes, "produces a technique of evasion as well as a technique of administration." (Censorship, 3 Encyc. Soc. Sci. 290, 294 (1930).) Censorship and hypocrisy thrive on one another.

One effect of sexual censorship is to intensify the technically "decent" but highly emotional concentration on sex in advertising and entertainment in forms that are comparatively morbid and unhealthful:

> "Censorship, official and unofficial, lets pass into the social mainstream countless images and innuendoes that could only be identified—if they were to be identified—as perverse. Of the normal, the lustful thoughts and desires of one sex for the other, it faithfully removes whatever trace it can." (Larrabee, "The Cultural Context of Sex Censorship," 20 L. & Contemp. Prob. 685 (1955).)

And it enormously increases the concentration of public attention on violence. "There is no mundane substitute for sex except sadism," writes the author of a study of the relationship between the two. "You may search the indexes to Krafft-Ebing, Ellis, Hirschfeld, Guyon, or any dozen sex scientists, but you will find no other human activity that can replace sex completely * * *. It is no accident that the end of Restoration bawdry coincided precisely with the fullest flowering of literary sadism in England * * *. The elegant eighteenth-century litterateurs, Johnson and Pope, are famous equally for the sexual purity of their writing, the sadistic cruelty of their speech. Sex being forbidden, violence took its place." (G. Legman, Love and Death, 9, 10 (1949).)

This phenomenon can be found ubiquitously in American popular reading matter—for example in the works of Mickey Spillane, which have the largest printings of any novels published in America. ("As of June, 1954, 24,000,000 copies of Spillane's books had been published." Christopher La Farge, "Mickey Spillane and His Bloody Hammer," The Saturday Review, November 6, 1954, p. 11.) The combination of sex and sadism has frequently been observed, but it should also be noted that there is an imbalance between the two. "Sex, in these novels, is lush but abortive and unresolved. Sadism is explicit, fully realized, minutely described." (Anon., "Dames and Death," Harper's Magazine, May, 1952.)

Ideally, the literary art and the public consciousness should lend equal weight to both love and death, to the act in which life begins and that in which it ends. The healthy mind will not become excessively preoccupied with either, but neither will it shun them. Deny one entirely, however, as sexual censorship aims to do, and the other is naturally increased in prominence and emotional magnetism. Our media of communication are therefore overabundant in violence—newspapers which prey on catastrophe, television programs and radio "soap operas" which prey on domestic misery, an entire division of book publishing which preys on murder.

Dear Ed:

Although I dislike being a debtor, you did say that you would listen to a trial spin of a recording of "Headlines of an Optimist". I am sending you the record. As you will note, it was just talked off the cuff and unrehearsed and obviously not written in advance.

I accept your proffer of advising (a) is it worth doing; (b) can I honorably shift it to you and take it away from NBC; and (c) what suggestions have you got.

Yours,

Dear Ed:

I have four items which may be of real interest to you:

1. An amazing opportunity for leadership in the industry as a result of the famous luncheon.

2. An answer from my friend on the Supreme Court bench.

3. A formula for a spectacular based on "Utopia 1976" which I outlined previously to Ray.

4. I have been offered a five day a week spot on NBC which I am tempted to take and which I can handle through tape recording.

Since you have said that you thought I had rendered service to your Company on two matters, I am not hesitant about asking you to advise me on the wisdom of doing such broadcast.

Dear Ed:

Note the enclosed exchange of correspondence that took place at the luncheon. Please return promptly for my files.

Some day you must do a television show about a young man who is a stout lawyer but employed in a job where he is effective but ashamed. The pattern is clearly to be seen in what this decent lawyer Salant told my friend. The other part of the show could be a woman who does not hold herself in high regard and still expects others to love her.

I think I may have the answer to the final act of my "Utopia 1976" on television. A part of the show will indicate the pace of change from the past to the present; then put on the screen as if it were a senate chamber 40 or 50 top Americans and get their predictions,-- Menninger on health, White on heart disease, Patton on farming, etc. etc. If you cannot use this idea let me know because I am already confident that my book can be marketed in a package with this concept. I am told that there will be a scramble by all our big business tycoons to get into this act and that the only difficulty will arise in the inability to select religious spokesmen without offending others.

Dear Mr. Salant:

Thank you so much for your letter of November 30. I too enjoyed our meeting and the constructive suggestions you and Dr. Wiebe made at that occasion. I hope to be in touch with you again in the very near future with a revised version of my report.

Dear Dr. Jahoda:

I am indeed happy to have had such a pleasant and constructive meeting with you and Dr. Cook, in the course of which we discussed your report and our correspondence concerning the report.

As the result of our meeting, it seems to me that the most desirable procedure in all the circumstances, and in order to achieve the objectives in which both of us are interested, is on the one hand for me to refrain from replying to your memorandum of November 23 and for you on the other hand to review the suggestions which Dr. Wiebe and I made today to determine whether you may wish to take these suggestions into account in revising your report.

I feel, and I hope that you will agree, that through our meeting we have established a better understanding and communication with each other and that this procedure should therefore supersede our prior written communications.

I look forward to this method as a happier solution to our mutual problems.

Sincerely yours,

My dear Ed:

Just want you to know that the luncheon yesterday was conducted with good will and, as I get the report from Dr. Yawger, developed great benefits for CBS, the elimination of the letter of inaccurate accusations and the establishment of a surprising amount of good feeling. I am always surprised how easy it is to operate with success with decent objectives. These chores that I have done for CBS and other congregations of capital are probably the nearest I'll ever get to an honorary degree. I confess they add greatly to my conceit.

Thanks for letting me bother you and participate in what I deem to be a victory of importance in social terms and particularly of great aid to the radio-television industry. Don't hesitate to let me know if some occasion arises in the future where I can help.

Yours,

P.S. I have just heard that Dudley Nichols, a distinguished writer in Hollywood, has presented a technique for handling "Utopia 1976" on film. The matter is now before Dore Schary. I can say no more because Dudley has pledged me to secrecy as to the unique approach, an approach which I scarcely understand and which might not be at all applicable to television.

P.P.S. I understand that you are considering as the antidote to Ernst the outlet for maternal instincts known as "Liberace". I have decided to ruffle my scant hair and to get out my old cello for the evening of January 6th.

Dear Mr. Salant:

Your letter of October 27 puts our correspondence unfortunately on a new basis. As you know, repeated consultation with the industry's leadership was part of my procedure from the outset, in the search for a true picture of the situation. Toward this end I took the following steps: (1) Before drafting a report I presented the findings of my study to leaders of the industry, including a Vice-President of CBS, in personal conversation. (2) In order to be sure that I had properly understood the views of every executive, I summarized each conversation in writing. (3) CBS received a statement of the essential points in my conversation with a Vice-President of your company. (4) At the request of this gentleman I visited him a second time and as a result of this conference I made several changes in my summary. (5) I submitted a first draft of the report to each executive I had personally interviewed. (6) In response to comments, suggestions and criticisms - including your own - I produced a revision of the report incorporating almost every comment I received. (7) I sent you a copy of this revised report, expressing the hope that you might wish to contribute further to its improvement.

Your answer radically deviates from this spirit of cooperativeness. While my own position is unchanged - my only interest in the matter is to present as correct a report as I possibly can - I note that your letter contains no constructive suggestions; that it was sent to a number of persons in mimeographed form without giving me a chance to respond to it; above all, that it amounts to a gross misrepresentation of my report.

Such misrepresentation occurs, as a rule, for one of two reasons: either because the person producing the misrepresentation has reasons for deliberately distorting a report in the wish to discredit its findings; or because he has misunderstood what the report said. I shall here assume that your misrepresentation is based on misunderstanding. Accordingly, I shall make every effort to explain and clarify; in many cases I shall be able to do so by quoting to you passages from the report which you apparently overlooked.

In view of the seriousness of your charges I have asked two of my colleagues to consider them independently. Each of us has carefully examined every point you raise. Our judgments concur that you distort the report. The enclosed memorandum deals with the matter point by point. Two general mistakes in your letter which underlie many of your detailed comments may as well be pointed out here. First, you assert in many places that the report contains statements which it actually does not contain. Second, in support of your arguments against this alleged content of the report you quote many facts as if you had uncovered them, while they are actually fully stated in the report at your disposal. I shall document this in detail.

I realize that the enclosed memorandum does not reflect favorably on the line of argumentation used in your letter. In view of the fact that you have seen fit to send out your charges, I have no alternative but to do likewise and make copies of this letter and memorandum available to all who have received copies of your letter.

Sincerely,

Marie Jahoda

Memorandum

Mr. Salant's Charges Against the Report Anti-Communism and Employment Policies in Radio and Television: A Study of Morale, and their Refutation

Note: The following charges are verbatim quotations from a letter signed by Mr. Richard Salant, Vice President of C. B. S.. Wherever possible the refutation consists in a verbatim quote from the report which was at Mr. Salant's disposal when he made his charge.

Charge a: "Text vs. data: Morale in general. The text seeks to establish that morale is exceedingly poor, with creative personnel unhappy, restive; frustrated, cynical and hostile. The data fail to support the text."

Refutation:

This assertion is untrue. For example, the text states:

"To round off this picture of general factors influencing morale and related to employment policies called 'blacklisting' there is one overwhelmingly positive aspect: the attitude of persons engaged in entertainment toward their work, independent of the specific working conditions. People on top, medium and low level; talent, producers and writers - most of them mention sooner or later in the interview the potentially tremendous satisfactions that entertaining holds out for the entertainer. They speak of radio and TV as superior media of expression, of their creative urges, of the thrill in knowing that millions of people see and hear them, of the satisfaction in meeting the challenge of a new medium, of the variety of work, its spontaneity, and of course the fact that it gives them a living. The excess of labor supply over demand is in itself an indication that the glamor and appeal of the entertainment world has not lost its attractiveness." p.23

"There are two apparently contradictory groups of stereotypes which exist simultaneously in the field: the easy going camaraderie of show people versus the cut-throat competitiveness of the entertainment industry; the devotion of a team to a creative and artistic task versus the mechanical routine of an entertainment machinery which interferes with creativity, dilutes high standards and has no room for the responsibility of the individual for his work." p. 15

"As to the relations between colleagues, here too opinions are, of course, divided. About one quarter of the people interviewed voiced no opinion or felt that there wasn't much difference between the entertainment industry and other fields, when it came to helping each other. Among the remainder, more than half were convinced that relations were better, while only 13% said they were worse than elsewhere. Statements such as the following were frequently made: 'People in show business identify with a fellow artist in trouble. They generally say to themselves: that might happen to me. And so I think they are very prone to helping each other out of difficulties.' " p. 16

In other words, a true characterization of the text is that it reports some factors which influence morale positively and some factors which influence morale negatively. Most of the details you mention in support of charge "A" concern aspects of good morale. In presenting them under the heading text v. data you imply that they were not contained in the text. As the following refutations show, this is untrue.

Details charge a:

> "Thus, in item 4 of the questionnaire the 64 respondents gave some 165 responses to what they liked most about working in radio and television. While the text emphasizes that 33 of the 165 responses identified 'economic factor ("the money"),' 107 of the 165 responses indicate that what they liked was the interesting, enjoyable, or challenging nature of the work, its creativity, the fact that it is worthwhile, the camaraderie, and the superiority of broadcasting as a medium for expression."

Refutation:

See above quotations from report, dealing exactly with these matters. That more than 50% of the respondents give money as a reason for liking their jobs is mentioned in one half sentence at the bottom of p. 23, in a context that has just previously established their interest in creativity.

Details charge a:

> "Item 6 discloses the largest number of people responding to the question whether they would prefer doing something else fell in the group which stated that they liked what they were doing."

Refutation:

This is treated in the report. It was stated thus:

".... only two out of all our respondents felt like leaving the entertainment field altogether. But about one-third said they would rather work in the theater or in movies than in radio or television; ...." p. 23

Details charge a:

> "Other data refute the picture of cynicism, suspicion, favoritism and lack of objective standards which the text seeks to draw as pervasive in the industry. Item 8 discloses that in this intensely competitive and emotional creative field, of the 96 responses to the question designed to elicit respondents' views as to why they state certain people are most successful in the business, by far the highest number of responses -- 39 -- stated it was because of greatest ability, while 21 identified highest prestige with the public or within the industry. Further, 36 of the 64 answers to the question whether the success was actually deserved were unqualifiedly yes, 16 were yes with qualifications and only 2 said no. In response to the question how, apart from ability, the most successful person got where he is, most responses reaffirmed ability or attributed the success to hard work, while only 14 of the 77 responses identified 'knowing right people' or 'connivance'.
> In response to the question in item 11 concerning the respondents' views as to his chances of being 'where...(he) would like to be career-wise in five years', only 6 thought they had no chance, 18 a fair chance, 14 a good chance and 14 an excellent chance. While a large majority of respondents thought that they could achieve their goals not through truckling or bootlicking but through hard work, study, perseverance, ability, self-confidence and self-reliance, only one respondent thought he might be hindered in achieving his goal by 'lack of right contacts'."

Refutation:

Your charge implies that selective reporting is based on a negative bias. This is untrue. Some figures have not been reported for one of two reasons: they are either not relevant to employment policies, or they are redundant because the facts have already been established in different form.

Such omissions refer to favorable and unfavorable comments. For example, in answer to question 7 about the most difficult problem facing the industry, by far the highest number of responses -- 29 -- mention mediocrity and poor quality. In answer to question 8, nineteen persons identify success with greatest income (a fact you regard elsewhere as derogatory, but do not mention in your discussion of question 8); other examples of information reported in the Appendix only concern blacklisting proper. They will be mentioned below.

Details charge a:

> "In response to item 13, 27 of the 64 respondents stated that they thought that the industry personnel was particularly helpful and only 6 thought that they were particularly unhelpful."

Refutation:

You apparently missed my statement of exactly this point on page 16. The report states this thus:

> "About one quarter of the people interviewed voiced no opinion or felt that there wasn't much difference between the entertainment industry and other fields, when it came to helping each other. Among the remainder, more than half were convinced that relations were better, while only 13% said they were worse than elsewhere." p. 16

Details charge a:

> "Item 15 discloses that in the event that a friend of the respondent was named as a Communist sympathizer, only 13 thought that the friend would be unlikely to come to the respondent for advice, while 28 said yes and 19 maybe."

Refutation:

You imply that the helpfulness of colleagues in cases of "blacklisting" has not been mentioned. In sharp contrast to this implication the report states:

> "People were asked whether they knew anyone in the field who was currently or had ever been 'blacklisted'. The vast majority (about four out of five) who answered the question affirmatively were asked how the colleagues and how the employer of that person behaved in the situation. Help from colleagues was reported only by 14% of those familiar with such a case, though sympathetic attitudes among colleagues without active help was mentioned by another 30%." p. 17

I want to point out to you that the report of actual events which I have selected to describe the attitudes of colleagues carries much more favorable weight for judging the atmosphere of helpfulness where it exists than the rather neutral and non-committal statement that friends might ask advice.

Details charge a:

> "Item 27 shows that where respondents knew someone who was 'blacklisted', only 6 stated that the employer fired him without concern and only 4 stated that his fellow artists didn't try to help him."

Refutation:

The table from which you made this entirely misleading selection of figures is discussed in the text. The report states the employer's attitude as follows:

"Actual help from the employer was mentioned as frequently as that from colleagues (14%). Sympathetic attitudes were attributed to employers, however, only by another 16%." p. 17

The second half of your sentence is misleading because it is incomplete. It is true that 4 stated that fellow artists did not try to help him but it is also true that 2 said they wanted to avoid him, and an additional 15 that they wanted to but could not help him.

Details charge a:

"All these data show a rather remarkable picture, quite different from that emphasized in the text. I use the word 'remarkable' because it must be remembered that we are dealing with creative people who by their very nature should be, and are, sensitive and individualistic. It is not surprising that creative people have pride of authorship and resent any interference. Yet by its very nature the broadcasting industry must be the product of many people. It is a licensed industry subject to the FCC. It is a complicated and technical business to get a program on the air. We have very grave responsibilities as a vast medium which comes into the homes of 34 million families which include not only adults but children. I am sure that you would not suggest that it would be desirable to turn over the air to individuals to say whatever they please in all circumstances. We have basic obligations to the public not only in terms of avoiding obscenity but in terms of taste, fairness, balance and objectivity. A licensee can exercise these responsibilities only as an organization.

In the circumstances it is not surprising that creative people have some resentment against 'outside interference'. It is surprising that you have failed to recognize the components of much of this 'outside interference' and its justification. And it is surprising that you find and report a picture of very low morale in data that appear to report substantial satisfaction with the job by the creative people, confidence that ability and hard work are the main ingredients of success, and a rather general belief that loyalty and friendship are important elements in personal relationships among people in the industry.

I do not for a moment mean to leave the impression that we are indifferent to those of the answers which are unfavorable and which indicate a morale problem. We are concerned, and we will continue to seek to improve morale although where the population (as you have noted in the report) is floating, so to speak, and is not a part of our regular staff, this is exceedingly difficult. But I want to emphasize that the comments I have made about the responses are intended only to indicate what I believe to be false in the text and not an excuse for our own self-satisfaction."

Refutation:

In view of the fact that the text, in fact, does not present the picture you allege it presents, your summary statement contrasting this imaginary image with the "remarkable picture" you see in the data needs no comment. However, I shall note those parts which you again present as if the report had not mentioned them:

Re creative people: "It may well be that creative people will feel cramped in any organization, and that artists resent restrictions more than other people." p. 19

Re industry's responsibility: "It would be wrong, however, to assume that the limitations inevitably imposed by the financial structure of industry are so severe that no other considerations enter into the formulation of policy. Not only are most responsible people concerned with the quality of entertainment, but - as network executives have pointed out - controversies of various kinds are actually presented on the air. Within the last year or two, the nation-wide controversy about the manner in which internal security problems are handled by certain individuals, committees and groups has found its place in radio and television; a few commentators can look back on an even longer record of dealing on the air with this most controversial issue. What controversies are treated by radio and television, and at what time, must of course be decided by general policy decisions. The issue then becomes one of drawing the line, which here - as everywhere else - hardly ever separates black and white but different shades of grey." pp. 6,7

Charge b: "Text vs. data: The role of 'blacklisting' in morale. As in the case of general questions of morale, I think that the data also not only do not support, but rather negate, the emphasis which the text places upon the question of 'blacklisting' and its effect on morale."

Refutation:

The implication of your statement is that the report overemphasizes blacklisting in view of what the data show. The closest the report comes to giving blacklisting a relative emphasis is on p. 15:

"Many of the industry's employees regard 'blacklisting' as just another possible source of insecurity in employment, to which they often attach no more importance than to others. When respondents were asked to compare the importance of the blacklisting problem with that of other problems they had discussed in the interview, only about one-third of those who expressed an opinion felt that it was very important. The rest regarded it as of minor or no importance." p. 15

The details with which you support the charge of overemphasis of blacklisting - an overemphasis which has not occurred - have been included in the text when relevant. The remainder are either misleading or of dubious relevance.

Detail charge b:

> "Thus, item 5 discloses that of 139 responses to the specific question of what the 64 respondents 'dislike most about working in' radio or television, only 6 responses identified 'blacklisting' -- and this in spite of the fact that the question was one of dislikes and presumably each respondent knew that the focus of the study's attention was on 'blacklisting.'
> Even more significant is the reply to item 7 -- 'What do you consider the most difficult problem facing the (Radio) (TV) industry today?' There were 85 responses from 64 respondents. Only one response out of 85 identified 'blacklisting.'"

Refutation:

Your assumption is wrong: No respondent knew in advance that "blacklisting" would form part of the interview.

Furthermore, let me give you a well-known example to indicate the meaning of spontaneous answers. Public opinion polls have asked questions such as: "In your opinion, what religious, national, or racial groups are a menace to America?" Only 10% of the respondents mention the Jews. If the Jews are mentioned in the question ("Do you think the Jews have too much power and influence in the United States?") 50% answer affirmatively. Most people are unwilling to interpret the first answer as showing that anti-semitism is unimportant.

why Jewish example you are

Detail charge b:

> "Item 24 discloses that 10 of the 64 respondents thought that a very small percentage or number are handicapped in getting jobs because they are 'blacklisted,' while 41 either replied that they didn't know or they didn't answer."

Refutation:

Item 24 also discloses what you neglected to mention, namely, 9 of the 64 respondents thought that more than 100 persons are affected by blacklisting. I made use of no figures derived from this question since I took the large proportion of "don't knows" to mean that the respondents had difficulty in estimating the number of people who are handicapped in getting jobs because they are blacklisted.

Detail charge b:

> "Item 33 shows that of the 64 respondents, 40 thought that the situation in regard to 'blacklisting' was getting better and 17 replied that they didn't know or gave no answer."

Refutation:

You will find this point made on p. 1 in the following form: "Gradually, the exchange of accusations and counter-accusations has begun to subside, and given way to a more rational approach to the problem of security."

It would probably have been a good idea to document this point with these data.

Detail charge b:

> "Even after an extensive series of questions which focused the entire interview on 'blacklisting' and inevitably raised all sorts of spectral suggestions in the respondents' minds, item 36 shows that 18 of the respondents felt that 'blacklisting' was very important in relation to other problems in the industry while 25 felt it of only minor importance, 6 of no importance, and 15 had no opinion."

Refutation:

Once again, you give facts as if they had not been treated in the text. To the contrary, the relevant passage from p. 15 which gives these same data has just been quoted.

Detail charge b:

> "These data seem to me to establish conclusively that even if morale were as bad as the text would indicate, 'blacklisting,' which after all purports to be the focus of your study, has minimal significance. This seems to me in the light of the subject matter of your study to be of paramount importance. Yet these data are, to say the least, elided in the text."

Refutation:

In earlier paragraphs I have already commented on the data which appear to you to indicate that blacklisting has minimal significance. In addition, may I call your attention to the views of top officials in the field, including the representative from CBS whom I interviewed. They do not share your view that the matter has minimal significance.

The report states:

"Yet the respondents' views of cynicism in management, to which they react in the same kind, are not verified when one discusses the situation with executives of networks, advertising agencies and packaging firms. In all but one of these interviews the existence of certain procedures to check on the views and political associations of radio and television personnel was discussed; in no case with either enthusiasm or cynicism." p. 44

"Those who have worked out procedures have given considerable thought to them and have undoubtedly spent thousands of working hours and much money on this, by their own standards, unenviable task. Nonetheless, nobody claimed to have found the right procedure that would avoid possible injustice to individuals.

"In the beginning of the interviews with executives, they were first acquainted with the results of the morale survey and asked if they cared to comment on it. With one exception where the attitude was completely non-committal, the findings of the morale survey were not brushed aside as of no importance to the industry. One or two executives felt it hard to believe that morale should be as low as indicated; several said they had expected it to be low. None took it lightly.

"All but one of the executives were ready to discuss means and ways of improving the situation...." p. 45

Charge c: "Text vs. data: The effect of 'blacklisting.' Nor do the data support the picture in the text of the specific constrictive and other evil effects of 'blacklisting.'"

Refutation:

To the extent that specific effects of blacklisting are referred to in the report they are supported by the data, as a reading of the report will show. Nor are these data negated by the details you cite, as the following paragraphs will make clear. However, in the event that you gained the impression that a black and white picture was presented, let me first quote from p. 47:

"...no one argues seriously that the content of radio and television programs has been affected by 'blacklisting', for better or for worse. The industry itself seems convinced of two facts: subversive ideas were not propagated over the air before 'blacklisting' started; and the accusation that the very best people were eliminated from the air by 'blacklisting' is for the most part without foundation."

Detail charge c:

> "Item 10, asked before there was specific focus on 'blacklisting,' shows that 38 of the 64 respondents gave an unqualified yes to the question whether they would contribute their services without pay to a benefit show; only 1 said no and 23 said it depends. Under conditions of refusal, it is significant that only 3 responses > listed 'not for any political cause', 2 'not if left-wing cause', and 14 'not if possibly communistic, subversive, un-American cause'. The great plurality of the reasons had nothing whatever to do with fear but were rather for such obvious reasons as lack of time, belief that contributed services were abused, lack of sympathy for the cause and possibility of political exploitation."

Refutation:

In this instance the data are given in the Appendix only. You realize of course that this is true also of other data which suggest a clear effect of blacklisting. For example: Of 53 persons who answered question 29 about things a person should or should not do in order to avoid being criticized on political grounds, 51 feel the need for some precaution. (I shall quote other relevant data from the Appendix later on.)

The answers to question 8 were not included because it is difficult to make an unambiguous interpretation of them. At this point in the interview the interviewers were instructed not to probe about hesitation related to blacklisting.

Detail charge c:

> "Item 23 shows that only 4 of the 64 respondents believed that a listed person was totally unemployable."

Refutation:

You are technically correct in stating that 4 out of 64 respondents so believed. However, you are completely misleading in quoting only one type of answer. The full story is that at least 36 of the 42 respondents who answered believed that employability was affected adversely.

Detail charge c:

> "Item 29 discloses that of the 64 respondents only 9 felt that because of the temper of the times and in order to avoid being criticized on political grounds it was necessary to 'be careful' about 'being friendly with certain types of people'; a minority of the 64 felt it was undesirable to discuss political matters around the studio, 18 thought it was necessary to be careful about joining organizations."

Refutation:

You are again technically correct but the full story is very different from the one you give. The 9 persons who answered that they thought it necessary to be careful about being friendly with certain types of people are 35% of the 26 who gave any answer at all. The "minority" of persons who did not feel free to discuss politics around the studio are 30 of the 37 who gave any answer. The 18 who felt it was unwise to join organizations are 75% of the 24 who answered.

Detail charge c:

> "These answers were answers given by the respondents in terms of the behavior necessary for 'others in the industry'."

Refutation:

You misread the tables. The figures you quote are from columns marked as referring to self, not to "others in industry".

Detail charge c:

> "Item 30 more vividly indicates a greater lack of restriction when the question is cast in terms of the respondents' own behavior: Of the 64 respondents, 11 stated that they find themselves hesitating to buy a certain (unidentified) book or magazine (including, presumably, everything from Homosexual to The Cross and the Flag) or hesitating to leave it around where it can be seen -- a reply which incidentally should be contrasted with the hair-raising example in the text at page 39 where the old 'It is said' is used to create the impression that it is unwise to walk into an advertising agency with a copy of The Nation or the New York Post. A substantial majority of the respondents stated that they do not think people in the industry ever hesitated to buy a certain book or magazine or leave it around where it could be seen and a substantial majority also did not answer in the affirmative the very broad question whether there was any subject matter that it was felt wise to avoid so that the program could not be criticized for containing an unpopular political slant -- a question which presumably would have elicited a 'yes' even if the respondent felt that it was wise not to write a play designed to show the alleged advantages of the Christian National Party."

Refutation:

If you will look again at item 30 and its counterpart, item 31, you will find the actual picture to be different from the one you present. It is true that 11 persons answered that they found themselves hesitating to buy a certain book or magazine. This is 20% of the 54 who gave an answer - hardly to be brushed off. But in item 31 it develops that 28 of the 41 who answer - i.e. 68% - believe that other people in the industry hesitate to buy or be seen with certain reading matter. This is not too far from the "It is said" illustration, after all. As for the respondents who answered the question about avoiding subject matter which might be seen to have an unpopular political slant, more than half, 16 of 30, said they felt this would be wise. (The 23 "talent" respondents were not asked this and 10 others did not give an answer.) If this proportion, slightly over 50%, could be generalized to the industry as a whole (and I have not said that it could) it would present a picture that thoughtful people might find quite disturbing.

I now turn to your numbered charges.

"This, then I think is the major, and indeed fatal, general defect of the report as disclosed, at least to me, by the raw data which are included in the appendix. I turn now to some specific criticisms of material in the report, many of which may be minor but which seem to me nevertheless to have a serious cumulative effect. I will take them in order."

Charge 1: "I still quarrel with the accuracy of the effect which I am sure is created by the sentence at page 5: 'Not to antagonize any section of the population, however small, has thus become the leading idea for many who set the policy of the industry.' This simply is not so. I am reasonably certain that every single program will doubtless antagonize somebody. If the program shows somebody drinking, it will offend the Prohibitionists. If a news report quotes an acid comment of Adlai Stevenson, it will offend some Republicans and if it quotes an acid comment of Vice President Nixon, it will offend some Democrats. Westerns antagonize some people; murder or mysteries antagonize other people; anti-Communist plays antagonize some people; trivial love stories antagonize some people; old movies antagonize some people; so does Milton Berle; so does Jackie Gleason. I could go on, but a sentence like that is so demonstrably foolish that, like A.P. Herbert's clock which at the stroke of midnight tolls thirteen times, it destroys the credibility of the entire performance."

Refutation:

While I am not sure what you mean by the "accuracy of the effect" of my sentence at page 5, there can be no doubt about the accuracy of the statement. All but one of the executives to whom I talked - including the executive of CBS - indicated to me that the policy of not offending is a leading idea in the industry.

However, what you say after quoting the sentence is entirely misleading. You incorrectly imply that the report says that TV and radio never do anything which risks controversy. Quite to the contrary. If you will reread pages 6 and 7 you will find the following:

"Not only are most responsible people concerned with the quality of entertainment, but - as network executives have pointed out - controversies of various kinds are actually presented on the air. Within the last year or two, the nation-wide controversy about the manner in which internal security problems are handled by certain individuals, committees and groups has found its place in radio and television; a few commentators can look back on an even longer record of dealing on the air with this most controversial issue. What controversies are treated by radio and television, and at what time, must of course be decided by general policy decisions. The issue then becomes one of drawing the line, which here - as everywhere else - hardly ever separates black and white but different shades of grey." p. 6-7

Charge 2:

> "At page 5 it is stated that 'In this situation, any spontaneous communication from members of the audience by mail or telephone assumes considerable importance.' Surely, public opinion is important to us, but the implication of this sentence is wholly unwarranted. In fact, it is refuted at page 22 of the text where it is stated that a number of letters received by both the producer and sponsor of a show, threatening boycott of the goods because an alleged subversive actor appeared on the program, were ignored. And again at page 22 of the text, it is reported that 8,000 letters of protest came in when a program shifted its time. But the program did shift its time."

Refutation:

The report makes a general point on page 5, as you say. It later qualifies the general point by indicating on page 22 conditions under which audience response has very little impact. Something suggested to you that the material on page 22 refuted rather than qualified and limited that on page 5. This leads you to quote my qualifications as though they were your own.

Charge 3: "The same sort of easy and obviously inaccurate generalizations appear on page 6 in the sentence 'Stripped to its bare essentials the assumptions underlying the industry's effort not to offend any member of the audience can be presented in the following manner' and the portion of the sentence 'since they can entertain the public without taking the risk of antagonizing one person, there is no reason to depart from the policy of trying to please many millions of people, without exception.' See my comments under 1 above."

Refutation:

Taken as isolated sentences out of context, the words you quote seem too strong. However you failed to note that the point is qualified in the paragraph following the sentence you mention thus:

"It would be wrong, however, to assume that the limitations inevitably imposed by the financial structure of the industry are so severe that no other considerations enter into the formulation of policy. Not only are most responsible people concerned with the quality of entertainment but-as network executives have pointed out - controversies of various kinds are actually presented on the air." p. 6 - 7

Nevertheless, I agree that the sentence ending "....without taking the risk of offending one person..." could be improved by the use of other words.

Charge 4: "Again, at page 6, I believe that the rather facetious dismissal of the possibility of how the housewife thinks, as is there indicated, is unjustified. How does the housewife proceed? What are the difficulties, except oversimplification, with the three-point formula set out in the paragraph? Can it be proven or even reasonably be argued that at a pre-conscious or unconscious level the entire gestalt of the show does not function in the decision-making, even if it looks superficially like random impulse?"

Refutation:

On page 6 I am reporting discussions with executives, not asserting any conviction or generalization on my part. When I return to the "three point formula" on page 49 it is discussed in the following terms:

"With regard to the general public, the fundamental assumption is that the public treats shopping as a political act. It has already been pointed out that this is unlikely. But much the same idea, less extremely formulated, appears to carry weight in the industry. The assumption is made that an unquestioned reputation of a sponsor will lead the public to choose his brand rather than that of a producer about whose policies questions have been asked; furthermore, that the public actually does ask questions about employment policy, or is aware of procedures in that area. To the best of our knowledge these assumptions about the public have never been definitely proved either right or wrong. But there is some fragmentary evidence to the effect that they are questionable. In those cases where networks and sponsors have chosen to ignore a threat of boycott, mentioned earlier in this report, no unfavorable public reactions ensued. Moreover, there does not appear to be an unfavorable response to the efforts of the companies that use more lenient standards and employ persons excluded by other companies for political reasons." p. 49

Charge 5: "At page 8, the footnote states that a copy of the interview schedule is included in the appendix together with the answers received to every question. I call to your attention that answers are not included to items 12 or 18 or the second half of 36.

Refutation:

As the appendix indicates, questions 12 and 13, and 18 and 19 have been coded together. ("Answers combined") The answers to question 36 have not been coded.

Charge 6: "While I think that the report makes fairly clear the limitations both in numbers and otherwise of the sample of 64 respondents, it seems to me that the problem is not quite so difficult, as the text at page 11 would indicate. It is relatively easy, for example, to find the total number of talent, producers, directors, writers and 'commentators' (of which CBS has none) which are on the staff of the networks; it also should not be too difficult to find the number of different people in these categories who appear with a fair degree of regularity but are free-lance. This would give some frame of reference by which to judge the adequacy of your sample.

"In any event, it seems to me that there is some rather substantial external evidence that the group is not typical. Thus, it is stated at page 30 that 94% of those who answered stated they thought that 'blacklisting' did more harm than good and this is re-emphasized at page 43 of the text in the statement, 'Overwhelmingly, the persons in the sample are of the opinion that no one should be excluded from work in the industry because of his political beliefs; qualification for the job is the only criterion in which they seriously believe.' These data cannot be reconciled with the actions of the creative people in broadcasting, acting through their unions -- which we must assume fairly represent membership sentiment. On August 10, 1955, the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists completed a referendum on the question of adopting a rule authorizing the local boards to take disciplinary action against a member who refused to tell a Congressional committee whether he is or was a member of the Communist party. The rule was adopted in a national referendum by a vote of 3,967 to 914. The American Federation of Musicians has long had a by-law on its books which provides that no local or its officers shall 'suffer a known Communist, Nazi or Fascist' to be a member of the local and that membership in Communist front organizations shall be deemed sufficient cause for expulsion. The Screen Actors Guild adopted a provision similar to that of AFTRA, while the Writers Guild has provided that anyone who 'could be convicted' under the Smith Act shall be ineligible for membership in the union. Since expulsion from any of these unions makes employment difficult, if not impossible, it would seem that the percentage of creative people in the industry who believe that some political tests for eligibility to employment are desirable or wise for one reason or another is vastly higher than that which your sample would indicate. I think this throws very considerable doubt on the results of the study."

Refutation:

I am afraid you don't appreciate the complexity of the sampling problem. I can only suggest that you reread more carefully pages 10 and 11 where this is clarified.

The union action most related to the content of the study is one which you do not cite: the repudiation of Aware, Inc. by the AFTRA membership. Aware, Inc., as you know specializes in propagating political information regarding individuals in the entertainment field.

Charge 7: "The last sentence of page 13 states that 'For the ordinary justification of competitiveness: "let the best man win", is not generally applicable to radio and television.' Here, again, is a rather vivid example of the disparity between unfavorable generalizations in the text on the one hand and specific data in the appendix on the other hand, which are ignored. For as noted, the responses to item 8 of the questionnaire show a rather striking belief among respondents that ability is the main reason for success in the industry."

Refutation:

The disparity results not from a discrepancy between text and data but from a misreading of the text. The data in item 8 are from a question about the "most successful" individual in radio or TV. The sentence you quote is from a context in which minor roles are being discussed. The star is specifically excepted from this discussion in the first paragraph on page 14:

"The limited visual scope of the television screen and the shortness of the time available for rehearsals make it extremely difficult for all but star performers to demonstrate superior abilities." p. 14

Charge 8: "The statement at the top of page 14 that there are no objective criteria for selection in the industry is simply not true. Producers know who is good and the 'limited visual scope of the television screen and the shortness of time available for rehearsals' are completely irrelevant factors. Producers don't watch actors on television screens; they watch them in the studies. And the shortness of rehearsal emphasizes ability. So, too, the number of shows -- often once a week -- brings many evaluative experiences. Again, item 8 with its remarkable testimony of belief that merit and ability are the central criteria, refutes this material in the text."

Refutation:

Again, as I have indicated in my comment on your charge 7, you have confused the answers to question 8 dealing with "the most successful" person with my discussion of job qualifications for minor roles.

Charge 9: "The Hollywood movie illustration appearing in paragraphs 3 and 4 on page 14 is irrelevant and is inconsistent with the data under item 4. As tabulated, 'the money' is the most frequent response, but I do not believe that it is justifiable to separate 'creativity' from 'work is challenging' or from 'superior medium for expression.' Any two of these total to more than the 'money' responses. So also do 'work is enjoyable, fun, interesting' and 'camaraderie; nice interesting people' total more than the 'money' responsess. I wonder whether you have any comparable figures from other occupations that show as small an emphasis on money in response to this question. I doubt, from examination of item 4, that one could hypothesize a culturally richer, or more self-realizing distribution of responses from any occupational group except such purely social service groups as, for example, teachers, ministers and social workers."

Refutation:

In commenting on your charge (a) I have already demonstrated that your charge of a one-sided picture of poor morale is incorrect. On the specific point you repeat here I consider your statement misleading because you fail to take note of answers to question 5, which show what people dislike most about working in the industry. There are 26 comments to the effect that the respondents have no sense of personal accomplishment, that they dislike low standards and the fact that techniques are more important than talent and quality; 32 comment that the control of the medium is in the hands of non-creative people, and that these persons have a desire to please everyone; 25 comment that the nervous pressure on the job is most disliked.

I do not consider it an insult to the industry to state that employees are concerned with money. In any case, the point made in my text is the symbolic value of money in an occupation in which other qualitative comparisons are difficult.

Since the same respondents are coded under more than one category, it is not legitimate to add the frequencies for two or more categories; the frequencies for combined categories can only be obtained by recoding. Your statement, "Any two of these total to more than....," is, therefore, misleading.

Charge 10: "The phrase 'this context' at the top of page 15 is puzzling. I suggest that 'this context' which presumably refers to the irrelevant Hollywood story, is not supported by the data and so it is doubly dangerous to interpret differences between top, middle and low level personnel a) which you do not report and b) which are very small sub-samples."

Refutation:

I agree that the sentence "In this context it is interesting to note that top and low-level personnel talk more frequently about insecurity in employment than those on a medium level" must be interpreted with caution; I fail to see in what sense it has derogatory implications for the industry. The "context" which puzzles you is clearly defined in the preceding sentence, which refers to money as "the major symbol of prestige and achievement" and goes on to indicate that money "conveys a sense of professional security far beyond the matter of security from want." The point of the sentence with the, to you, puzzling phrase is that the function of money as symbol of security is not simply in terms of the absolute amount of money, but operates differently at different employment levels.

Charge 11: "As I have already noted in my general remarks earlier, the second paragraph of page 15 is actually an understatement of the responses in items 5 and 7. 'Blacklisting' appears to be one of the least important disliked things. The clause '...compare...with other problems they had discussed...' seems difficult to defend when this item on 'blacklisting' was immediately preceded by some twenty other items on 'blacklisting.' What you appear to have here is the real maximum of concern when perception is highly structured with reference to 'blacklisting.' No other problem was discussed or focused in comparable fashion."

Refutation:

As I have already noted in discussing your charge (b) the relatively minor importance attached to "blacklisting" by many respondents was fully discussed at an early stage in the report.

Charge 12: "'The communication between management and employees' is referred to at page 15, paragraph 2. Yet an important aspect, emphasized when it suits the report's convenience at page 10 in discussing the difficulties of sampling, is ignored at this point -- namely that a substantial part of the talent and creative people is free-lance so that normal employer-employee communication is impossible. This accentuates the difficulties of the problem although it may not excuse what poor communication and bad morale there may be. But fairness to the industry would seem to compel some notation of the extraordinary problems which inhere in the transitory relationship between particular broadcasters and so many of the people of whom your respondents are supposed to be typical."

Refutation:

I make the assumption that the reader may be relied upon not to have forgotten what was said on page 10, by the time he arrives at page 15.

Charge 13: "The findings in the first full paragraph of page 16 are presumably based on item 12. As I have noted, no data for item 12 are furnished in the appendix."

Refutation:

As I have noted, the appendix clearly indicates that answers to questions 12 and 13 have been coded together.

Charge 14: "Are the comments at page 17, first incomplete paragraph, spontaneous? If so, they should be identified as such. And it is significant that while almost half the respondents thought that a friend of theirs would come and ask for advice, most others said 'maybe.' When the text merely states that half would ask for advice, the clear implication for the reader who does not turn to the appendix is that half would not. Yet item 15 demonstrates this implication to be false."

Refutation:

I do not understand your comment. The questions asked are listed in the appendix. No question appears there, or was asked, whether blacklisting affected solidarity. Of course, this comment was spontaneous, though everyone had a chance, and many respondents did, elaborate on reasons for helping or not helping colleagues in "blacklisting" troubles under question 27.

As to the sentence about "almost half the respondents," the way you refer to it makes it sound as though I was trying to create an impression of low solidarity, an impression I could achieve only by suppressing some of the data. The context, however, makes it perfectly clear that the function of the sentence is diametrically opposite to the one you impute to it. I had just quoted a remark which indicated fear of giving assistance and went on to say, in counter-argument, "But almost half...etc."

In any case, the reader cannot come away from page 17 with the interpretation that the respondents believe that almost half the colleagues of a person who is "blacklisted" would remain coldly indifferent to his plight. I state on the same page 17 that "help from colleagues was reported only by 14% of those familiar with such a case, though sympathetic attitudes among colleagues without active help was mentioned by another 30%." Even the quotation referred to above made the point of a widespread desire to help one's friends.

Charge 15: "I do not believe that it is accurate to state that the conclusion that 'relations to employers are often experienced as poor' is supported by such answers as 'the nervous pressure' (last paragraph, page 17). The nervous pressure may well have nothing to do with relationship to employers. It much more probably relates to such intrinsic characteristics of show business as dependence on audience approval and the demands of rigid scheduling."

Refutation:

I can only interpret the charge as a misreading of the paragraph. Here it is:

"In general, relations to employers are often experienced as poor. This emerged spontaneously in answer to the question as to what a person disliked about his job in radio or TV. Many factors are mentioned here: the insecurity of the job (20%); the nervous pressure (41%); the blacklist (10%); the lack of standards and talent (42%); and others. But no other factor is regarded as frequently the cause of dissatisfaction with the job as network and advertising executives, and sponsors: fully 52% of the respondents take the question as an occasion to describe the frustrating lack of understanding between the creative people in the field and those on the business and administrative end."

It is clear that the "here" of the third sentence refers not to "relations to employers" but to dislikes about the job. Hence, the "Many factors" of that sentence are not in the context of "relations to employers". The support for the statement about poor relations to employers is given in the next sentence, "But no other factor is...."

Charge 16: "I feel that a rather colorful example of imbalance in the text is presented by the material at pages 18 to 21. Here three full pages are devoted to quotations from responses to one sub-category of item 5. Other responses to that item, reported by 20, 41 and 42% of the respondents (hardly insignificant), are not given proportionate attention. Then, having presented this three page, skewed report of what is disliked, we find what is liked reported in a single paragraph at page 23, introduced by a rather supercilious 'To round off this picture'. Neither percentages nor quotations from responses appear to be in order here. Perhaps I am prejudiced; indeed, I am. But my prejudice against this report is fed by the solid facts of such unbalanced reporting which is wholly at odds with the data in the appendix. If, as you say in your letter of October 3, you have not tried to give your own views of the industry, but 'rather to present what people working in the industry say about it,' I think it might be well to reconsider whether you have accomplished this objective."

Refutation:

The "other responses to that item" to which you refer are insecurity of the job (20%) which has already been discussed; nervous pressure (41%) and lack of standards and talent (42%). My quotation of answers dealing with employment policies and not with nervous pressure, etc. is simply a function of the fact that the study deals with the former, not the latter.

Charge 17: "I question whether page 19, lines 4-6, is good research reporting. Out of 136 responses from 64 people (item 5), there are only six mentions of 'blacklisting' even though the respondent was asked to recite his dislikes. In that situation you give verbatim excerpts from two of the six in which mention of 'blacklisting' occurs close to mention of constriction by employers. I question whether you are justified in reporting an association or a linkage on the basis of this evidence."

Refutation:

One of the uses of direct quotations in social research is precisely the one which you question, namely to demonstrate how ideas are linked with each other. The paragraph makes this clear in emphasizing, on occasion spontaneously. It reads: "And the general dislike of policies presumably established in the interest of good business is on occasion spontaneously linked to those employment policies which are referred to as 'blacklisting'." p. 19

Charge 18: "The reference at page 19, last paragraph, to the urgency of communication and clarity of relation between policy makers and employees fails to take into account the extremely perplexing factor which I have already mentioned, that many of these people are not employees at all except on an extremely irregular basis and hence communication and clarity become difficult."

Refutation:

Nowhere has the report denied the difficulty of the task, it has only emphasized its urgency. It states: "...communication and clarity in the relation between policy makers and employees would be particularly urgent to keep such inevitable resentment within manageable limits." p. 19

Charge 19: "I have already commented on the factors so heavily emphasized at pages 19 and 20 relating to the resentment of creative people toward all outside interferences. Nowhere is the rational necessity for such interferences suggested and nowhere is it emphasized that it would be extraordinary were it otherwise. Again, the important point is that despite these wholly natural outbursts most of the people in your sample like what they are doing."

Refutation:

In clear contradiction to your charge that the necessity for some interference is nowhere mentioned are the following statements from the report: "What controversies are treated by radio and television, and at what time, must of course be decided by general policy decisions. The issue then becomes one of drawing the line, which here - as everywhere else - hardly ever separates black and white but only different shades of grey.

"Not only with regard to content but also in questions of employment policy with which this report is mainly concerned, the limitations imposed by the financial structure of the industry require complicated and immensely difficult policy decisions." pp. 6,7

Charge 20: "What is the meaning of the last two lines on page 23? Is it necessarily bad for many people to like the financial rewards of a job? This finding is reported as if 50% of the respondents mentioned only money as the 'most liked' thing. But the 165 responses to item 4 suggest that even those who mentioned 'the money' mentioned it among other 'most liked' things."

Refutation:

What is actually said in these two lines is: "But about one-third said they would rather work in the theater or in movies than in radio or television; and 50% of the respondents mention 'the money' when asked what they like best about their jobs." p. 27 This sentence elaborates upon the phrase, "occasionally qualified" in the opening sentence of the paragraph, "But this enthusiastic identification with the world of entertainment is occasionally qualified when it comes to TV and radio proper." The intended implication of the citation of the "the money" response is that the high incidence of this response suggests that the "enthusiastic identification" is not always so all absorbing as to preclude the awareness of an extrinsic factor as a major value.

Charge 21: "Obviously everything which I have already said indicates that I quarrel most strongly with your last paragraph at page 24 where you state that 'These, then, are some of the major aspects of morale in the industry. It is against this background that the views on "blacklisting" must be appraised.' The word 'some' carries a rather heavy burden. I do not believe that you have done an objective job of reporting the morale in the industry. You have strained hard even before you get to 'blacklisting' to dramatize its role despite its relative unimportance in items 5 and 7. Although 'nervous pressure,' for example has four times the prominence of 'blacklisting' in the responses to item 5 the former is not discussed. As I have noted, there is no proportionate emphasis on the positive data in item 4."

Refutation:

You completely ignore the purpose of the report which clearly is stated thus on p. 7: "In this area it is hardly surprising to see the entertainment industry - with its sensitivity to the climate of opinion, its concern for public favor, and its existing machinery for barring from the air anything assumed to be detrimental to the business purposes of the industry - becoming enmeshed in a variety of procedures, commonly referred to as "blacklisting", which reflect the developments initiated by the country's concern with internal security. It is the purpose of the present study to explore what these practices mean within the industry." (underlining supplied)

If I ever do a study on general working conditions in the industry, I shall certainly deal fully with the question of "nervous pressure" and other matters. In the last three sentences you repeat charges regarding the treatment of data from questions 4, 5 and 7 which have already been repudiated.

Charge 22: "I believe that the second paragraph of page 26 quoting but not translating Baudelaire is wholly unfair to the executive who is quoted. Exhibitionism is not a substitute for objective and careful thought.

"In addition, in all fairness to the executive who is quoted, I wonder whether you do not agree that our judicial authorities dealing directly with this very issue are somewhat more relevant than M. Baudelaire who wasn't faced with the problem at all. The California courts have explicitly held that their statutes which forbid discrimination in employment because of political belief afford no protection for employees who are dismissed or not hired because they are Communists. The Federal courts also support the executive. In American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 US 382, dealing with the constitutionality of a provision of the Labor Management Relations Act which withdraws the services of the National Labor Relations Board from any union which has failed to file a non-Communist affidavit, the late Mr. Justice Jackson (who was certainly not indifferent to individual liberties), in his concurring opinion sharply distinguished between the Republican, the Democratic and the Socialist Parties on the one hand, and the Communist Party on the other. He stated that 'the Communist Party is something different in law...Congress could rationally conclude that, behind its political party facade, the Communist Party is a conspiratorial and revolutionary junta...' In United States v. Dennis, 183, Fed 2d 201, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit -- one of the most respected courts in the land -- speaking through Judge L. Hand upheld the constitutionality of the Smith Act on the precise ground that the American Communist Party was a 'conspiracy.' In upholding this decision the Supreme Court speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Vinson (Dennis v. United States, 341 US 494) adopted Judge Hand's rationale. It refers to the members of the party as constituting 'a highly organized conspiracy.'

"In these circumstances it seems to me that you have done a serious injustice to the executive whom you deride."

Refutation:

"The most beautiful ruse of the Devil is to persuade us that he does not exist." The translation of the quote was omitted since the phrase happens to be composed almost entirely of words with a clearly recognizable Anglo-Saxon meaning.

I do not deride any one or several executives. I am puzzled to see how a misunderstanding about "deriding one executive" could even arise. The Baudelaire quote follows a discussion of the tendency among top executives to deny that there is such a thing in the industry as a blacklist.

Your legal quotations are completely beside the point. They refer to cases of known communists. The report does not deal with such cases, nor with the conspiratorial nature of communism.

Charge 23: "The quotations at pages 26 and 27 are not typical of the quantitative data appearing in the items. Again, there are no offsetting quotations or references to conflicting data."

Refutation:

In contrast to your assertion, the report states, "Let us first consider two contrasting views on the situation" (p. 26; underlining supplied), clearly implying that they are not meant to be typical.

Charge 24: "In the response to item 4, page 31, it is stated that 28% of the sample which answered said that they thought that listers were 'sincere but crazy.' I would doubt very much that this many people should have coincidentally seized on such a curious word as 'crazy.' My doubts are bolstered by turning to item 26 in the appendix where the same question appears but the answer is 'sincere but misguided, crazy.' Standing alone this is a small thing, but I cannot help the feeling that the omission of the far less vivid word 'misguided' which in fact belongs there should give the reader pause on the care and objectivity with which the text was drawn from your data."

Refutation:

As you say, this is a small thing. About the only comment worth making is that the interviews are full of the "curious word...crazy", which apparently occurs to many persons spontaneously, even though the question was phrased in highly positive terms: "Are the listers sincere and patriotic?"

Charge 25: "Item 6 at page 31 appears to be incompletely reported."

Refutation:

The full details are given in the Appendix. What is shown there is that only one respondent believed that creative people were for the "blacklist", while the modal category - 17 - reported that creative people were against it.

Charge 26: "I have already commented on the fact that the material at pages 33 to 46 relating to the consequences of 'blacklisting' is not supported by the data. The pattern of quoting statements in the text without balance or without reference to the actual data is continued throughout this section."

Refutation:

I have examined the details of what you felt to be a "pattern of quoting statements...etc." for the material prior to page 33 and, as you now realize, have found it to be a misrepresentation of what is actually in the text. Since you do not detail the evidence for the "pattern" you find in pages 33 to 46 I am unable, of course, to continue my effort to clarify the report for you. Were this possible, you may be sure that your sweeping accusation would again be demonstrated to be due to misconception and misunderstanding.

Dear Ed:

1. Enclosed find, for your eyes alone, copy of letter received from Pat Weaver. I thought you would be interested particularly in the last line.

2. It was fun the other evening. I have jotted down a few samples of items which I thought could visually portray the pace of change which I think must be the springboard for conditioning people into looking at the future.

Since I believe that dreams make history I am unashamed to ask you or anyone else to help spread my dreams. Let me know if I can help you on any portion of any future dream program.

Dear Morris:

I didn't see 1976, TV, being globe-rounding. That also makes me mad-going from duties right now, but let me know if you call a mass meeting of Upward-and-Onward Utopians, count me in.

Hope you're $elling book$ like crazy.

Tidbits to show pace of change so as to get myself ready for the prophesy of the future.

1. Length of life -- picture Founding Fathers - average 41 at Constitutional Convention. U. S. Senate now about 56.

2. Agriculture - trees without limbs; no cotton for womens stockhings; synthetics for mens clothes; sheep shearing finished by 1976.

3. Parm 1787 and present mechanical farms -- picture of a fish farm in interior of the nation; one bull sire of 1000 cows by artificial insemination; picture of herd.

4. Male teachers up to 1850. Female teachers 1915. Increase of male teachers by 1955 and increasing.

5. Kitchen - outside privy; no water in sink; washing machine, incinerator, etc.

6. Heat by logs in Philadelphia at Convention -- 14 Negroes supplying wood daily -- now house heated by solar heat in Boston for several years -- Lewis Strauss' statement: light and power so cheap it won't pay to have meter. Thus end of telephone and light poles and wires.

7. Clothing -- hoop skirts out when train comes in; now nylon for airplanes; length of womens skirts for 40 years directly up or down with stock market quotations. Economics and clothing.

8. Churches shifting from leisure in Heaven to leisure on earth; new church building near Washington Square for hobbies.

9. Langmuir and rainmakers.

10. Madison, with quill, kept minutes of Constitutional Convention; then stenographer took dictation, already now many stenographers never see people who dictate.

11. Size of families.

12. Hours of labor; Gary quote on steel industry and 12 hour day; now factories closed on Saturday, etc. Vacations.

13. Father - son fishing together; daughters always had adult female symbol before them.

14. 50 Years ago man dominant in home; never washed dishes or changed diapers; see young couples today.

15. Lancashire riots about 1820 because of machines - automation now.

16. Show in picture form past and present which conditions audience, for interview about the future.

17. See UNESCO film of peasant taken in Helicopter to Paris to interview scientist; see Bill Leonard's script of year 2000, as to gadgets.

18. Health - tuberculosis sanatorium closed down in Saranac; it was killer number one in my youth; soon old age will be the only disease. Franklin quote.

19. Possible contrast with the Orwell film shown in England on television.

20. Food -- size of apples, tomatoes, etc. Production per acre or man by pictograph a la Newrath.

21. Exhibit of a great quantity of synthetically produced items.

22. Exhibit recently in Washington of 300 new metals and materials resulting from atomic research.

23. See new cities such as near Trenton.

Did you see Pat Weaver's Utopia show? It was worse than Orwell because Orwell had as a purpose a desire to make people hate the orthodox regimental world of 1984. Pat seems to want us all to love the super-orthodox world of gadgets and things which he foresees in 1976.

Crystal Gazing at NBC

NBC purported to give viewers a "sixty-minute look at the world of tomorrow" in yesterday's "1976" (4:30 p. m.), but in retrospect it was a very tiny world that concerned the network.

Basically, it revolved around the pushbutton existence we may all enjoy in our homes twenty-one years from now. With several wide-eyed people beside him, Dave Garroway served as a guide through a 1976 home, which frankly seemed neither comfy nor private. It had walls made of air, or something, an electronic heating system, television phone, a shopping device built into a sinkless kitchen, and, for junior, a house all to himself in the yard, complete with food storage, washing and ironing machine, music area, etc.

NBC stars were called upon to illustrate life in 1976, among them Sid Caesar and Nanette Fabray, who portrayed "The Commuters" as they would behave twenty-one years from now. Sid complains that it took "twenty minutes to come home to New York from his job in Saipan." Later a contraption called "The Fight Decider" was used to settle an argument between Sid and Nanette.

The idea of "1976" is a good one, but in execution it resulted in a dull and ponderous venture that projected an empty world. Viewers were spectators rather than participants in NBC's crystal gazing, which did not touch on an over-all way of living in 1976.

As some one at my house said: "Outside of Caesar and Fabray, almost everything on the show can be seen in a modern furniture store." M. T.

'Show Biz' Spectacular

A mild-mannered calvacade of show business from 1900 to the present was shown last night (7:30 to 9) as an NBC spectacular under the title of "Show Biz," based on the book of the same name by Abel Green and Joe Laurie jr.

Featuring a host of entertainment notables, "Show Biz" provided a series of old and new acts in a concert presentation, devoid of any rousing highlights. It contained much singing and dancing and vintage jokes. It also was reminiscent of radio in that it as possible both to view this urri of talent and not the medicine shows to the honky tonks, the nickleodeons, speakeasies, vaudeville, Broadway, radio and video. To illustrate the many phases of "Show Biz" he had support of such able personalities as Buster Keaton, Bert Lahr, Eartha Kitt, Rosemary Clooney, Dennis Day, Beatrice Kay, and Jay C. Flippen. Art Linkletter's participation was mainly limited to extolling the virtues the sponsor's products.

My dear Ed:

I have seen W.B. for brief chats since we met at your house. The more I hear of the situation, the more I am convinced that from the C.B.S. viewpoint the proposed strategy can eventually be most hurtful. I am quite sure that men like Robert Morris, former counsel to the Jenner Committee, would be in agreement on this score.

Although I am mighty busy between now and the end of the week when I go abroad, you can tell Danny that, whereas I would not enter the situation because of your collateral relation to it, I would come up as a general friend of the situation and talk to him if he so desires. He and C.B.S. can get one hell of a beating if the company proceeds as it intends. As a matter of fact, this may be the kind of situation which the Committee of the Republic would concern itself with in its exploration of so-called "blacklisting".

If you saw Brandon in London, give me a ring. Is there anything I can do for you in the East -- or anywhere?

Dear Ed:

If your initial hunch that my Utopia might be converted by a skilled person into a television program has been proven false, do send back to me the volume or let me know where I can call for it.

I have received an offer from a radio station to try a novel idea for a 13 week program, in effect talking the content of a utopia of hope in detailed terms, to a radio audience. They are toying with the idea of having questions from the public each week, to be answered at the start of the next week's program. Such a radio audience would probably be larger than any book audience and I am quite sure that the book publishers will capitalize on the weekly sales pitch which will be made on the radio program.

All of this intrigues me and it certainly is a new gimmick in connection with the marketing of book ideas to the people of our Republic.

Who "Collaborated" with Russia?

By PAUL WILLEN

IN SEPTEMBER 1944, three months after the invasion of France and eight months before the final capitulation of the Third Reich, a nation-wide poll was taken of the American people in which the following question was asked:

> Do you think the kind of government Russia has at the present time is about the same kind she had five years ago, or do you think it is different?

Thirty-six per cent of those polled thought Russia had "the same kind of government." Twenty-nine per cent did not know. Five per cent thought it had "changed for the worse." But thirty per cent believed that it had changed "for the better."

In other words, almost a third of the American people acknowledged that between 1939 and 1944 they had come to hold a more favorable view of the Soviet system. This is to say nothing of those whose picture of the USSR had altered in the same period but were unconscious of the change. Another poll, taken at the same time, asked

> From what you have heard, do you think the kind of government Russia has is as good as she could have for her people at the present time, or do you think a different kind would do better for the Russians?

Twenty-eight per cent thought a different type of government might be more beneficial. Twenty-six per cent did not know. But forty-six per cent thought that the type of government Russia then enjoyed was "as good as she could have for her people."

At the same time the people were also asked, "Do you think the kind of government Russia has will have any effect on other countries?" Only twenty-one per cent stated that Russia's governmental system would have an "effect on other countries," and of that twenty-

---

PAUL WILLEN has written for Commentary, The Reporter, The New Republic, and for the State Department's Problems of Communism, mostly on the subject of the Soviet Union. He is a graduate of the Russian Institute at Columbia University.

Reprinted from the Fall, 1954 issue of The Antioch Review, Yellow Springs, Ohio. Copyright 1954 by The Antioch Review, Inc.

one per cent two-thirds believed that the effect would be indirect and emulative. Only seven per cent of the American people, in other words, foresaw an aggressive Russia in the postwar period.

Recalling these facts in 1954, ten years later, may startle some Americans, especially those who have, to one degree or another, accepted the now-popular theory that the postwar expansion of Communism in Europe and Asia was largely the result of White House capitulation to Communist advisors. This theory, which portrays the American people as innocent victims of a vast international conspiracy, is one of the basic ingredients of the trend in American politics which we now label McCarthyism. Indeed, the basic justification for whatever suspension of civil liberties has occurred in the past five years is the assumption that China would not have fallen to the Communists had Hiss, Lattimore and Harry Dexter White been removed from the government many years ago.

McCarthy's accusation of "twenty years of treason" is the most crude and exaggerated expression of this viewpoint. More sophisticated observers, unwilling to accuse Roosevelt and Truman of outright and conscious betrayal, attribute the loss of China to the "softness" of the New Deal toward Communism as the result of which Hiss and Lattimore assumed positions of such great influence.

I cannot take up either the accuracy (in terms of fact) or the realism (in terms of world politics) of these charges; rather I aim to question their very pertinence. If it is true, as the above-cited polls suggest, that the American people themselves were "soft" on Communism in the wartime period, the question of the undoubted gullibility of the White House politicians loses much of its weight and seriousness. But it is not my purpose here to apologize for the diplomacy of the Roosevelt administration; nor is it to deny the influence of Communist agents and spies in the American government; nor is it, incidentally, to embarrass politicians like McCarthy, who accepted Communist support in his 1946 campaign for the Senate, or McCarthyites like Walter Winchell who told millions in 1944 that the "fear of Russia" is a "bogey." (Both men have survived such embarrassing revelations.)

My purpose is to show that wartime pro-Soviet feeling was far more widespread, had much deeper roots, received encouragement from much more respectable quarters, than it is discreet to remember now in the year 1954. Once the American people realize that the "softness" allegedly responsible for the fall of China was not confined to the White House and not the result of a conspiracy, they may begin to look for the real and deep-rooted causes of the tragic absorption of China into the Communist Empire.

II

In 1942 the excellent New York Times journalist, James Reston, came out with a book, Prelude to Victory, in which he discussed, among other things, the responsibilities of a newspaper toward the war effort. He was disturbed by the Washington Times-Herald which, in an editorial sharply attacking Russia for its failure to join the struggle against Japan, had written that "we cannot expect too much of Russia. The bear that walks like a man does not always think like a man." Reston commented:

> Now I ask you, what is the point of that kind of scurrilous criticism . . . It is not alone that editorials like this have a negative quality. They can do positive harm, as any reporter who has ever stepped inside a Russian embassy will tell you. . . .

He explained that while he was not in favor of a "moratorium on criticism of our allies" he was against anything but "constructive criticism." He urged journalists to consider the political and military effect of their correspondence. Objective reporting which was "negative" and did not contribute to the winning of the war was more than unnecessary, it was harmful, "as any reporter who has stepped inside a Russian embassy can tell you."

James Reston, who was acutely conscious of the problems of a newspaper editor, voiced the wartime philosophy of journalism consciously. But for others the new demands were incorporated into the daily copy unconsciously. In a totalitarian country such alterations of "line" are made overnight by governmental decree and there are no loose ends—such as the Times-Herald—sticking out. But in the United States the changes demanded by war occurred slowly, with a certain degree of spontaneity. For some, however, it was too slow. Bishop Manning thundered on August 24, 1942: "Anything in the nature of anti-British propaganda or anti-Russian propaganda . . . is a dangerous and peculiarly despicable form of sabotage." This was an exaggerated expression of a general feeling which gripped America as the war consumed more and more of its energies.

The problem was deeper than that of maintaining cordial relations between the allies. The problem of the maintenance of public morale under increasingly difficult conditions was even more pressing. Our soldiers were soon to risk their lives; our citizens were paying enormously high taxes and submitting to an ever-tightening rationing. Would the American people have permitted the shipment of billions of dollars of goods and war materiél to the Soviet Union had they felt a measure of the hatred they now feel toward the Soviet Union, even with the menace of Hitler's legions before them? Clearly it was necessary to create and intensify feelings of good will toward our allies and to sustain a mood of optimism generally toward the future. Henry Wallace's naive platitudes on the "century of the common man" were front-page stories in this era because, among many sections of the population, these words represented "something worth fighting for." Under these slogans men would fight with a valor and heroism which more stodgy and realistic slogans could hardly hope to elicit. In those days, when the nation itself seemed at stake, nothing was spared, not even inherited misgivings about the unnatural offspring of the Bolshevik revolution.

In November 1941, Collier's magazine ran an editorial in which it asked: "Why all these efforts to pretend that Russia is something which we know it is not? Russia is not a democracy . . . why kid ourselves otherwise?" Two years later, in December, 1943, Collier's again posed the question: "What kind of country is Russia, anyway?" It is surely neither Socialistic nor Communist, Collier's replied, but rather it has a "modified capitalist set-up," with wide wage differentials, industrial piece-rates, savings' banks, and well-paid industrial managers living at standards "enjoyed by leaders of private industry in this country." Therefore, Collier's concluded, Russia was "evolving from a sort of Fascism . . . toward something resembling our own and Great Britain's democracy."

The astounding political metamorphosis revealed in these two editorials was also evident in Collier's feature articles. Quentin Reynolds' article, "A Russian Family," published August 7, 1943, is a good example of Collier's wartime output. The central point of his correspondence was that Russian families were quite like American families, "much like the Smiths or the Jones on your block." Many homey touches were introduced to reinforce his point:

> Grandma Starotsin looks much like any other grandmother, whether you'd meet her in Sevenoaks, Kent; Londonderry, Ireland; or Middletown, Ohio.

Reynolds assured his readers that the only reason the Starotsins had to share a kitchen with another family was that the building program had been interrupted by the war—as if crowded living conditions were unusual in urban Russia! As it was, the "average" Russian family Reynolds visited occupied three rooms!

Reynolds' article was typical of hundreds. Harrison Salisbury wrote up Eric Johnston's trip to Russia and noted with approval Johnston's observation that there was "no reason why close, friendly and cooperative business relations" could not be established between the two nations. Salisbury's technique for ingratiating Russia to his audience was impressive:

> Mike Kulagin . . . boss of the [Urals] section . . . built like a Golden Gloves champ . . . tough as one of Zane Grey's Texas gunmen . . . could stand up and slug it out toe to toe with such American pioneers as Jim Hill, Jay Gould or Jim Fiske.

Collier's also published Donald Nelson's account of his trip to Russia in which Nelson concluded "we are both interested in the same thing —raising the standard of living and prosperity of our countries. . . . You do it your way. We'll do it in our way." Another issue of Collier's contained an optimistic account of TWA's plans for an air-route across Alaska and Siberia by Fred R. Neely. Siberia was portrayed as a rugged frontier land, with great wealth, and unlimited opportunities for enterprising men. Neely made no mention of the slave labor camps in Siberia about which much was already known.

For a magazine which had declared in 1941 that it was unnecessary "to pretend that Russia is something which we know it is not" this was an extraordinary journalistic performance.

But Collier's was by no means alone. The Saturday Evening Post competed with it in pro-Soviet effusions, despite the fact that its chief political writer, Demaree Bess, in an analysis published in March 1943, displayed a remarkable awareness of the impending struggle. The Post's correspondent in Russia was Edgar Snow, whose pro-Soviet sympathies were unmistakable. Between 1943 and 1945 the Post printed twenty-four of his articles and made him an associate editor.

On December 14, 1942 Snow described the "People of Russia," and quoted a collective farmer as saying that "compared to old Russia, it is heaven compared to hell." Another collective farmer, borrowing a phrase from Stalinist propaganda, told Snow that "we are beginning to have a wonderfully rich life." Another article dealt with Russian military men. The generals were "men of the people . . . an example for his men in every respect . . . clean minded . . . free from Freudian complexes"; in some ways a typical general "reminds you of a good YMCA secretary," but not, however, a "prude." Summing up the Soviet military caste, Snow wrote ". . . all his training and experience have made this man democratic."

With the exception of an analysis by Peter F. Drucker, Snow's ecstatic correspondence was all the material the Post published on the Soviet Union during the last three years of the war.

The outstanding contribution of American journalism to the growing wartime pro-Soviet mood came from Life magazine, which devoted its entire March 29, 1943 issue to "Soviet-American cooperation." Without this cooperation, Life's editors explained, "there can be no stable, peaceful world."

Life's editors gave an account of the difficulties encountered in putting this special issue together due to Soviet restrictions and secrecy. "They live under a system of tight, state-controlled information." And then followed this extraordinary passage:

> But probably the attitude to take toward this is not to get too excited about it. When we take into account what the U.S.S.R. has accomplished in 20 years of its existence we can make allowances for certain shortcomings, however deplorable.

And furthermore:

> If the Soviet leaders tell us that the control of information was necessary to get this job done, we can afford to take their word for it.

Life acknowledged some difficulties in American-Soviet relations: "Though we both have the same aims . . . the methods we employ are in many cases diametrically opposed." Their conclusions: The Russians should be less suspicious of us, and we, in turn, should put more confidence in them.

This editorial was followed by a multi-colored photographic essay on the Soviet Union, describing the "vast achievements in the first two decades of the U.S.S.R.," picturing our ally as a robust and healthy nation. The collective farms shown looked neat and prosperous. The Russian farmer: "though he grumbles sometimes like farmers everywhere, for the most part he is content." Soviet collective farmers "elect their governing body," and "whatever the cost of collectivization . . . the historic fact is that it worked . . . the system satisfies both socialism which abhors private ownership . . . and the peasant, who wants to own land."

Life's condensation of Russian history followed the well-known pattern set by Soviet historians, lauding the great and brutal Czars who welded together the Russian state. Their history is climaxed by Lenin, the "well-balanced" leader of the Bolsheviks who "made the Revolution make sense and saved it from much of the folly of the French Revolution."

Adhering to the popular wartime glorification of the Great Russians, Life described them as "one hell of a people" who "look like Americans, dress like Americans, and think like Americans." Stalin is recognized as a dictator, but Life's editors seemed not especially disturbed by the fact. On the contrary, a formalistic discussion of Soviet election procedures leaves the impression of a large degree of self-government in the Soviet Union. A chart is included of the Soviet government, with arrows, designating lines of power, leading from the masses to the higher organs of power.

In order to familiarize the American people with the work of the NKVD (the successor to the GPU) Life refers to it as "a national police similar to the FBI" whose job is "tracking down traitors." The popular theory that all the objects of the NKVD's widespread and interminable activities were "traitors" and German spies was given thorough respectability by Joseph Davies, the former American envoy to the Soviet Union, whose analysis of the Russian role in world affairs appeared in this issue of Life. Davies, who was introduced by Life as a foremost expert, answered a series of questions, among them the following:

> Can we assume that the rulers of Russia are men of goodwill toward other nations and that they desire a peaceful, stable world? . . .

"Yes," Davies replied, ". . . the Soviet Union is not a predatory power like Germany and Japan. . . ." Davies' postwar forecasts were without exception optimistic; he expected complete Russian cooperation in building a strong postwar China under Chiang Kai Shek's leadership. Life registered no complaints on any of these judgments.

Davies was much in demand throughout America at this time. Three weeks after Life's memorable Russian edition appeared, Warner Brothers released its cinematic version of Davies' book Mission to Moscow. Critics found the movie even more favorable to the Soviet Union than the book. Life itself remarked, in a somewhat critical vein, that the film made the Russians "look and act like residents of Kansas City, and the American standard of living appears to prevail throughout the Soviet Union." Bosley Crowther, the New York Times' critic, was not impressed with the movie, but observed that "still it should be a valuable influence to more clear-eyed and searching thought."

Davies was so popular that the Reader's Digest published Mission to Moscow in condensed form in one of its issues. The condensation included Davies' unforgettable analysis of the great purges of 1936-38:

> "What about the fifth columnists in Russia?"
> I replied, right off the anvil, "There aren't any—they shot them."

In the same article Davies explained away the Nazi-Soviet pact, justified the Stalinist dictatorship, and lionized the dictator himself.

The Digest's coverage of wartime Russia was not, in fact, very much more restrained than Life's. Its correspondent in Moscow was Maurice Hindus who reported enthusiastically on the vigor and resourcefulness of the people brought up under Soviet rule. Hindus's accounts were written with a great deal more knowledge and discretion than those by reporters of Reynolds' calibre, but with essentially the same purpose and result.

The Digest also published a condensation of Sumner Welles' Time for Decision in which Welles predicted that "Russia will act on the theory that her prosperity can be assured only through an international organization capable of maintaining peace." Welles maintained moreover that Russia was "entitled to take such steps as it may judge best to create a regional system of Eastern Europe." As for the Soviet system itself, Welles expressed the view that it was "superficially true . . . from the standpoint of our Western tradition" that it was a dictatorship, but that "from the standpoint of the Russian people, it is a hopelessly inadequate appraisal." Like Life in the case of Davies, the Digest printed these views without editorial objection or qualification.

Early in the war—1942—the Digest condensed a book called The Problems of Lasting Peace by Herbert Hoover and Hugh Gibson. Their extensive survey of postwar possibilities was in no way distinguished, and is mentioned here only for one reason: the Soviet Union was not even considered by the authors as one of the "problems" involved in achieving a "lasting peace." Indeed, the Soviet Union is hardly considered at all, and one can assume that the authors entertained few fears about postwar Soviet designs on the rest of the world. Of course, the book was written early in the war when only the most far-sighted observer could foresee the enormous power with which the Soviet Union would emerge from the war. But that fact merely underlines the hypothesis of this essay by indicating how unprepared the American people were for the postwar years, even an American who was one of three Republican Presidents who refused to extend diplomatic recognition to Soviet Union during their terms of office.

In all fairness, it should be pointed out that in the middle of 1944 both the Digest and Life recovered a portion of their balance with regard to the Soviet Union. In the latter half of 1944 Life published William Bullitt's sharply critical analysis of the emerging Soviet policies in Eastern Europe, and the Digest published William L. White's controversial Report on the Russians. But the recovery, even late in 1944, was not complete. In the very same issue—October 1944—in which the Digest offered its readers Alexander Barmine's warning of the nefarious designs of his former Kremlin employers, it also published Eric Johnston's glowing account of his recent trip to Russia.

In this same period Johnston himself was evidently regaining his own equilibrium. After praising the Soviet Union in traditional wartime fashion to a Seattle audience on August 24, 1944, he departed from the "text" to observe that the Soviet Union was a land where "civil liberties are only a vague promise" and where, "if there is any religion, it is the worship of Stalin." And then he added this curious remark:

> In my travels I have rediscovered America. Never before did I realize the importance of our freedom, our standard of living, our right of habeas corpus, our Bill of Rights. Don't sell America short.

Did Johnston realize that he himself had come close to "selling America short?" Apparently so; the "travels" had served as a healthy corrective to impressions received abroad, and he had, perhaps belatedly, "rediscovered . . . the importance of our freedom."

But Johnston was not alone in his temporary flirtation with Soviet apologetics. On the contrary, those who did not pass through such a stage were in the minority, isolated and useless to America at war. The pro-Soviet mood pervaded almost all our publications. The Rotarian, for example, printed very sympathetic portrayals of the Soviet Union by Leland Stowe and Sir Bernard Pares. Pares explained that "unlike Trotzky, who thought in terms of communizing the world, Stalin has but one big yet simple idea. It is to develop his country. . . ." Leland Stowe concurred. Another Rotarian writer, Harland H. Allen, forecast a rapid expansion of Soviet-American trade in the postwar period, made possible by the "peace-loving character" of the Russian people. The Rotarian's book reviewer offered the following reading list on Russia: Davies' Mission to Moscow, Pope's Maxim Litvinov, Edelman's How Russia Prepared, and Lesueur's Twelve Months that Changed the World. These books, all pro-Soviet, were becoming part of the national reading list.

Even nonpolitical magazines such as the National Geographic Magazine were caught up in the pervasive pro-Soviet atmosphere. The November 1943 issue contained an informal tribute to the Russian people by Eddy Gilmore which stressed the common characteristics of the American and Russian people.

> I don't mean the way we comb our hair or wear our clothes, but the way we work and play and fight. Our impulses. Our emotions. Our loves and hates. Our violences and our greatnesses.

The May 1943 issue featured an excellent description of Magnitogorsk by John Scott, who had participated in its construction. Scott's objectivity was not, however, apparent in the captions (selected presumably by the editors) under the photographs accompanying the article. Beneath a photograph of three Russian peasant girls standing with shovels the editors wrote: "Such stalwart, smiling girls taught the Nazis the meaning of total war . . . these girls lent a hand digging a canal." Another photograph showed a man and his son reverently gazing at the Kremlin from one of the Moscow River bridges. "There, son," the father is alleged to be telling his son, "lives Marshal Stalin, Head of the Government."

III

To understand what had happened to American public opinion during the war one must reconstruct in one's mind the whole atmosphere of the period. America was engaged in "total war." The newspaper headlines daily described the ebb and flow of battles on a front stretched across several continents. By 1944 the nation was spending 100 billion dollars a year to maintain the military forces that pushed that front ever closer to the German and Japanese borders.

From the low point of 1942, when victory was an uncertain goal in a very hazy future, the allies had slowly gathered sufficient force to narrow the war to the long-awaited invasion of France and the encirclement of Japan. The invasion of the continent was the subject of ceaseless speculation, and considerable anxiety. Many thought that hundreds of thousands would be lost in the undertaking.

This was a time when the American people needed every kind of emotional reassurance which could be supplied to them. To sustain fighting morale, to justify huge sacrifices, men had to be infused with great hatred of their enemies and, at the same time, great confidence in their allies. To have questioned the intentions of these allies—upon whom so much of the war strategy depended—would have been to have jeopardized the entire national morale.

Hence it came to be that the war bred so many illusions; but this was nothing new. War inevitably encourages men to dream, to entertain vast and spectacular hopes. One of these dreams was that the war would be followed by a long period of world peace; this dream was based upon the assumption that all evil in the world had its roots in the demented personalities who directed the German and Japanese war machines. The very idea that evil lurked anywhere else had implicit within it the possibility of future battles. For this few men were prepared.

Hence the destruction of the German and Japanese armies became synonymous with the ushering in of a world of peace and plenty.

Hence the popularity of the term "unconditional surrender" which, despite its diplomatic awkwardness, neatly captured the intense feelings of hatred generated by the war.

For the very same reason that our propagandists distorted German history so that it became nothing but a series of military adventures, our propagandists expunged from Russian and Soviet history everything that might cause apprehension. Foster Rhea Dulles' book The Road to Teheran, The Story of Russia and America (1944), was a labored effort to demonstrate the historical precedents for Russo-American friendship. Summarizing the book, one critic wrote, ". . . as international relationships go, those between the United States and Russia have been exemplary . . . there is only one Great Power against which the United States has never taken up arms: Russia."

This was indeed true: but was it relevant? The question was not asked. The success of an effort such as the Russian War Relief—to which many distinguished Americans lent their names—depended upon the ability of our scholars and journalists to sell the idea of the basic compatability of Soviet and American policies and war aims. As we have seen, they set about this task with great zeal.

They were joined by politicians and statesmen too numerous to mention. It was impossible to overpraise the contribution of the Red Army to the common effort. For example, on the 24th anniversary of the Red Army, February 23, 1942, General Douglas McArthur issued this typical statement:

> The world situation at the present time indicates that the hopes of civilization rest on the worthy banners of the courageous Russian Army. During my lifetime I have participated in a number of wars, as well as studying in great detail the campaigns of outstanding leaders of the past. In none have I observed such effective resistance to the heaviest blows of a hitherto undefeated enemy, followed by a smashing counterattack which is driving the enemy back to his own land.

His modest conclusion:

> The scale and grandeur of this effort marks it as the greatest military achievement in all history.

Many of Eisenhower's tributes were no less restrained, and his personal expressions of confidence in the Russian military and political leaders were very much in keeping with the spirit of the times.

A very typical tribute was the one the Utah Senator Elbert Thomas delivered at a New York dinner on February 23, 1943 in which he compared the Red Army with the forces of George Washington. "Freed by the people's army, Russia today knows what she is fighting for. Men, women, and even children, have tasted freedom. They call it good." The very same day the New York State Senate passed a special resolution commending the Red Army.

On the second anniversary of the German invasion of Russia the governors of twenty-five states took the trouble to issue a proclamation extolling "our heroic allies of the Soviet Union," declaring that it was "eminently appropriate, and in the American tradition, that the American people should pay public tribute to such gallant and effective allies." A mass rally in New York on the same day heard the former Mayor of New York, James J. Walker, describe the "heart-warming gallantry" of the Red Army as an inspiration to civilization.

As if in reply to these gestures, two weeks later the Fourth of July was celebrated in the Soviet Union with American music, jazz, and laudatory speeches. The Soviet tributes to Anglo-American military achievements—since wiped from Soviet history texts—almost equalled the fervor of the Anglo-American tributes to the Red Army. This partial reciprocity of compliments naturally stimulated further expressions of admiration from the West. On the 26th anniversary of the founding of the Red Army (1944), Churchill dispatched a message to Stalin which included the following:

> . . . I send you . . . this expression of my profound admiration of [the Red Army's] glorious record. Inspired and guided by your leadership and by their love of the soil of Russia, trusting their skillful and resolute commanders, they will go forward to victory and through victory to peace with honor.

Poet Laureate John Masefield composed an "Ode to the Red Army" which was read at celebrations of the Red Army's memorable foundation throughout England.

Every device was used to deepen friendship with the Soviet allies. Russian music became enormously popular; Russian dances and folk songs were in great demand; symphony orchestras vied with each other to play Shostakovich's new works. The Philadelphia Orchestra was honored with the task of introducing the new Soviet national anthem, the "Hymn to the Soviet Union," to the American people at a special 1944 performance attended by Andrei Gromyko. The "Internationale" was also frequently heard.

The demand for increased cultural interchange provided an excellent arena for a variety of Communist-sponsored front organizations such as the Congress of American-Soviet Friendship. American opinion was so sympathetic to the Soviet Union that it was impossible to detect direct Communist manipulation. Indeed, the New York Times officially "welcomed" the commemoration meetings held in 1943 on the anniversary of the October Revolution "under the auspices of the Congress of American-Soviet Friendship."

On this occasion the "Congress" organized a great demonstration at Madison Square Garden in New York at which thousands heard speeches by Paul Robeson, Claude Pepper and Corliss Lamont, and applauded enthusiastic messages from politicians such as Sam Rayburn, Daniel Tobin and Jan Masaryk. Donald Nelson told the crowd that "the Russians who I met understood the meaning of a square deal and a firm agreement." Joseph Davies spoke too, stressing the common idealism of the Soviet and American peoples. William Green, President of the AFL, also addressed the gathering, and though his remarks lacked the blind enthusiasm of the other speakers, he too lauded the recent Moscow Conference upon which so much of the diplomacy of Yalta and Teheran was to be based.

The middle of 1943 was a period which Life labeled, apparently with some justification, "the era of good feeling," because the comradery between the Allies reached its highest pitch during those months. Life's Russian edition appeared in March, followed shortly by the Warner Brothers' version of Mission to Moscow. In April Wendell Willkie's widely read account of his good-will tour of our Allies, One World, appeared. Walter Lippmann said at the time that One World contained one of the two finest analyses of the Soviet Union that had reached the public (Mission to Moscow, incidentally, was the other). Willkie was conscious of potential sources of friction between the United States and Russia, but he had great confidence in our ability to overcome them because, as he put it

> The Russians, like us, are a hardy, direct people and have a great admiration for everything in America, except the capitalist system. And frankly, there are many things in Russia that we can admire—its vigor, its vast dreams, its tenacity of purpose. . . .

Willkie's confidence did not waver in the early months of 1944 when, with the growing dispute over Russian plans for Poland and the timing of the Second Front, Russo-American relations cooled a little. In an article in the Times published January 2, 1944 Willkie wrote that while "some persons have suggested that Mr. Roosevelt has gone too far" at Moscow, Cairo and Teheran, "in my judgment, he has not gone far enough." At the same time, Willkie confessed that Soviet activities in the newly liberated regions of Eastern Europe were not absolutely clear.

The wartime American infatuation with things Soviet took a variety of forms. One tack was well represented by the aviator-turned-airlines-executive Eddie Rickenbacker, who upon his return from a trip to the USSR, told a Times reporter that he was "particularly impressed" with the "iron discipline in [Soviet] industrial plants, the severe punishment for chronic absenteeism, incentive pay, compulsory overtime work and 'no labor difficulties.'" In other words, like many Americans, Rickenbacker was delighted to find that, contrary to his fears, the Soviet Union did not pamper its working class. Indeed, the Russian workers did not even enjoy the basic rights and privileges accorded to the American workers, and Rickenbacker was "impressed."

The absence of anything resembling workers' control and the existence of a well-paid and privileged managerial class in the Soviet Union were frequently cited during the war as factors favoring Russo-American friendship. Walter Duranty wrote a series of articles in the Times showing exactly how far the Soviet Union had come from the utopian hopes of Lenin's days. For many, of course, this progression was not altogether welcome. But for Rickenbacker, Davies, and many others the reactionary character of Russia's industrial relations was something of a relief.

Rickenbacker did not, however, confine his enthusiasm to Soviet industrial relations. He stated that Stalin's dissolution of the Comintern (1943) was, in his opinion, "sincere and permanent." And he added that > Stalin's failure to respond to repeated invitations to meet with President Roosevelt and . . . Churchill should not be misunderstood, since the Soviet leader has been extremely busy. . . . Let us keep an open mind. Let our great leaders, if necessary . . . visit Russia and Mr. Stalin with the hope of a more complete and better understanding not only during the war, but for the postwar period as well. . . .

Stalin's refusal to meet Roosevelt and Churchill abroad was not the only incident which brought forth apprehensions of the type decried by Rickenbacker. In 1943 our ambassador in Moscow, Admiral Standley, publicly expressed his irritation with the Soviet refusal to publicize the amount of American aid it was receiving. His sudden outburst caused something of a flurry, and brought forth considerable concern lest the incident offend the Kremlin. Senator Tom Connally, speaking on the Senate floor, deplored the possibility "that there should be any incident to provoke friction between the United Nations," and said he couldn't understand "why he [Standley] should make such a statement." Senator Alexander Wiley from Wisconsin was just as vigorous in his rebuke of Standley:

> All this fuss and feathers is just a tempest in a teapot. Stalin appreciates what the United States has done for Russia . . . we must recognize that there is not going to be any selling short by anyone. We must paddle together or the boat will go down.

Senator Vandenberg was equally alarmed by the "fuss and feathers" that threatened the quiet of Wiley's "teapot": ". . . I am amazed," he said, "by Admiral Standley's remarks. . . ." The Texas Representative Luther Johnson remarked that "the Admiral probably got his facts mixed up a bit. I think it is unwise, when we are engaged in war, to make faces at our allies."

Admiral Standley was, as a matter of fact, replaced in Moscow not long after his outburst. This action evidently made him realize that the American public would not tolerate skepticism toward its allies from its officialdom, for after his return he took a stand fully conforming to the wartime cast. Speaking in New York on September 15, 1944, when the Second Front had been established and another "era of good feeling" had set in, he told a group of business executives that

> . . . after victory, security is the Soviet Government's next consideration. I feel confident that we are on the threshold of a postwar period of collaboration in the fullest sense of the word.

The concern for postwar "collaboration in the fullest sense of the word" was so great that even authentic reports of Soviet atrocities could not break through the solid front of inter-allied cooperation. In 1943 the German radio announced the uncovering of proof of Soviet responsibility for the slaughter of 10,000 Polish officers in Katyn Forest.

The Polish Government-in-exile broke off relations with Moscow, and there was considerable disturbance in Allied quarters. The concern, however, was not over the authenticity of the report, but over the possible harm its issuance might have on Allied unity. The New York Times called the termination of diplomatic relations between Poland and Russia a "victory for German propaganda," implying that the Katyn Forest massacre itself was only "German propaganda." Newsweek also scoffed at the German report: "The worst feature of the situation was that the immediate break was caused directly by German propaganda." Newsweek explained that the "violence of the Russian reaction" to the report was due to the "sensibility of [the] Soviets in dealing with foreigners"; and it referred to the "mistaken . . . unrealism" of the Polish-exile Government's request that the International Red Cross be permitted to investigate Katyn Forest.[1]

During the war our propagandists and politicians were on continual alert lest a piece of "German propaganda" turn the American people from its allies. In March 1943, Gardner Cowles, Jr., publisher of Look magazine, and director of the domestic service of the Office of War Information (the OWI), demanded that the people make an "unequivocal commitment" to postwar cooperation. Stalin, he reassured the people,

> . . . wants just what the United States wants—security and peace . . . we need to get over the strange notion which too many Americans have that we will have to fight Russia in another twenty or twenty-five years.

In June 1943, James Farley said that it was the "obligation" of all of the allies to band together in the postwar world, and it was therefore necessary to allay the fears of those who still suspected the "ultimate aims of our Russian ally." This general line of reasoning continued until very late in the war. Late in 1945 General Eisenhower told a House committee, after his trip to Moscow where he had reviewed a Red Square parade from atop Lenin's tomb, that "nothing guides Russian policy so much as a desire for friendship with the United States."

[1]A House Committee which investigated the Katyn Forest massacre in 1952 declared that the suppression of information about the massacre was a product of the "strange psychosis" of the Roosevelt administration, a "psychosis" which apparently extended to Newsweek magazine.

It was in the spirit of these times that the New York Times published a number of articles by the Soviet writer Ilya Ehrenburg, articles which stressed cooperation and community of aims. Also in this spirit was Cyrus Sulzberger's report on his trip to Russia. The report was objective by wartime measures, but contained nothing critical of the Soviet Union.

But the Times' concern for postwar collaboration was mild compared to that of the New York Herald Tribune which wrote editorially in the following fashion as late as January 26, 1945:

> There are no greater enthusiasts for "Uncle Joe's boys" today than our troops in the Ruhr and in the Ardennes. . . . Here is one aspect of the international relations too often overlooked by the theorists. "Uncle Joe's boys" may inspire alarm in some sections of the armchair brigade, but to the man in the street they are "ours," and to the fighting soldier they are heroes. . . .

The Tribune—despite the obvious bias—made a very valid point, one which was very evident in the aftermath of the terrible "battle of the bulge"; the Soviet Army had borne the brunt of the ground struggle with Germany, and, without it, there would have been many more "battles of the bulge" for the American Army. As the two armies raced across Germany in the early months of 1945 it was indeed natural that some sense of mutual indebtedness was felt.

But what was surprising about the Tribune's editorial stand was that it exulted in that indebtedness and attempted to exploit it for political purposes. Still the Tribune was only an exaggerated expression of a national trend. The bulwark of national thinking on international relations, the Foreign Policy Association, had little else to offer. At its annual luncheon in 1942 its members had listened to Vera Micheles Dean's statement that America and Russia had "two fundamental things in common . . . a boundless optimism . . . an inherent desire to improve human welfare." The FPA report in 1943 declared that there was "little evidence as yet to indicate that Russia would want to dominate Europe."

To the annual dinner in 1944 the FPA invited Sir Bernard Pares and Vera Micheles Dean, who delivered customary pro-Soviet addresses, and Alexander Kerensky, the man who had since 1917 symbolized the struggle against Bolshevism. But apparently not even Kerensky's fervent anti-Bolshevism could withstand the impact of American wartime enthusiasms. The main burden of his address was to justify Stalin's reabsorption of the Baltic States and eastern Poland. Though he could not support Stalin as the leader of "international communism," he did recognize him, he said, as the present leader of the Russian people, and as such, congratulated him upon his triumphs. He assured his audience, furthermore, that the annexation of eastern Poland was in no manner in conflict with Stalin's concern for "international security," but rather an expression of it.

Another veteran of the old struggle against Bolshevism who now believed in the sincerity of Stalin's professions was Winston Churchill who in a House of Commons' address of May 24, 1944 offered this analysis:

> Profound changes have taken place in Soviet Russia. The Trotzkyite form of communism has been completely wiped out. The victory of the Russian armies has been attended by a great rise in the strength of the Russian state and a remarkable broadening of its views. The religious side of Russian life has had a wonderful rebirth.

And, in particular, so far as postwar aims are concerned, he told Commons after the Yalta conference early in 1945:

> The impression I brought from Crimea . . . is that Marshal Stalin and the other Soviet leaders wish to live in honorable friendship and democracy with the Western democracies. I also feel that no government stands more on its obligations than the Russian Soviet Government.

Thus Churchill gave expression, in his eloquent prose, to the hopes of the peoples of the Western democracies. These same sentiments were expressed, in humbler language, by the American Gold Star Mothers when, on September 30, 1943, they presented a plaque entitled "What America Means to Me" to the Soviet Government in appreciation of the "magnificent" fight of the Red Army and in token of the "common aims of the youth of Russia and of this country." Juri S. Okov, secretary to the Soviet Consul in New York, accepted the gift in the name of his government in a solemn ceremony at Rockefeller Center.

IV

As I have already indicated, resistance to the wartime enthusiasm in America for the Soviet Union was neither extensive nor powerful. But throughout the war a steady undercurrent of resistance—isolated, confined, and subdued—did exist, and continued to produce sideline hecklers. The resistance came from two widely separated centers of political thought.

On the one hand, there was the anti-Communist left, and on the other there was the isolationist and anti-Communist right. As might be expected, the immunity of these two groups was based upon distinct and mutually exclusive premises and experiences. The isolationist right had fought America's entrance into the war and even in war was not altogether resigned to many of its political implications, particularly the degree to which the war compromised America's sovereignty. The anti-Communist left, on the contrary, had led the fight for American involvement in the anti-fascist struggle, and supported the military struggle wholeheartedly. It had, however, great misgivings about the collaboration with the Soviet Union, an uneasiness which had its roots in the genuine knowledge and hatred of totalitarianism of the anti-Stalinist left.

"Begging nobody's pardon," the New York Daily News recently boasted in an editorial, "this newspaper never did get suckered into believing that Bloody Joe was fighting for anything but eventual Communist domination of the world." The boast is largely accurate, even though the News and other reactionary newspapers published their share of praise for the "gallant and mighty Red Army" as well as the correspondence of journalists sympathetic to the Soviet Union. They published few full-scale attacks on the Soviet Union, and respected, to some degree, James Reston's strictures. But neither did they glorify the Soviet social system or forecast everlasting cooperation and peace between the wartime allies. The conservative Reader's Digest, as we noted before, published the optimistic analyses of Welles and Johnston; but at the same time when friction between the allies began to grow ominous, it published Barmine and White's attacks.

The approach of the anti-Communist left was different in character, much more positive and forthright. It did not control any mass media, and was therefore under no compulsion to muffle its suspicions. When Davies' book Mission to Moscow was issued as a movie in April 1943, Norman Thomas organized a protest memorandum which was signed by 52 people most of whom were anti-Communist liberals, leftists and New Dealers. The statement asserted that the film "falsifies and glorifies dictatorship . . . creates the impression that the methods of Stalin were not incompatible with genuine democracy."

Members of the same general grouping organized a meeting to protest the Kremlin execution of two prominent Polish Socialist Bundists early in the war. While the Times buried the report of the execution in a back page, the Social Democratic New Leader displayed it prominently. The protest meeting reached the front page of the Times, but Litvinov's lame explanation of the execution was again given an insignificant niche in the Times.

The same pattern was followed when the story of the Katyn Forest massacre was made public by the Germans. Newsweek ridiculed the German claims; but the New Leader, the American Mercury, Commonweal took it seriously, and tried to warn others of its meaning for America. These groups were composed of both Socialists who had fought Communists at home and ex-Communists who had gained a first-hand knowledge of Communist techniques; the war-time excitement could not dull their memories, and they tried to give America the benefit of their unique experiences with Communism.

For this group the wartime period was one of intense frustration. They saw their country engulfed by the slogans and rationale of Soviet apologetics which they had fought in the labor movement for so many years. They watched painfully as our major organs of expression absorbed the arguments and atmosphere of the Popular Front. They looked on in anxiety as Communists infiltrated agencies of propaganda and public opinion, unnoticed because their own "line" so nearly coincided at the time with that of Life, Collier's and the Office of War Information.

Indeed, in this period in American life, the Communists were in a far better position to serve American interests, as they were visualized at the time, than the anti-Communist liberal. The Communists were ready, indeed eager, to provide America with that type of rationale for Soviet injustices which America required for emotional reassurance. The Communists supported the war effort with a vigor and certainty which was compelling, and urged only that more of America's resources be given to the pursuit of victory. In the labor movement they advanced and supported the "no strike pledge"; they tolerated no serious criticisms of the American system; and indeed, they opposed the efforts of Negro leaders to organize a march on Washington to protest segregation in the armed forces.

So well indeed had the Communists harmonized themselves with the wartime political atmosphere that Earl Browder, then the American Communist leader, told a reporter that he saw "nothing strange" about the resemblance of the Communist program to that of the NAM! Browder's reply to the reporter's question reveals a great deal about both the Communists and the general milieu of American politics during the last war.

The causes of the extraordinary success of world Communism in the postwar years lie in social and economic conditions which this essay cannot deal with in any comprehensive fashion. In some places the powerful and victorious Red Army was the direct agent of social change; in others spontaneous and indigenous forces fed the growing Communist parties; in still others it was a combination of the two which, in the chaos that followed the destruction of the Japanese and German empires, toppled already shattered kingdoms.

Overnight—so it seemed—600 million people vanished behind the Iron Curtain, and Communist parties of immense strength in Europe and Asia were clamoring for entrance. Most of America still awaits an explanation for this shattering experience.

A small minority examines political systems, standards of living, economic doctrines, fading classes and cultures; and seeks an answer. The vast majority are convinced that the terrible onslaught was due to the policies of the American government.

Yet this essay should make it clear that hardly anyone in America was prepared for the aftermath of World War II. Had we been prepared, it is doubtful that we could have, short of war, denied the Russians the "fruits" of their military victory. But were we?

A nation-wide poll taken in 1942 asked the American people, "If you had to choose, which would you rather see in control of Europe—Germany or Russia?" Six per cent replied Germany; twenty-three per cent did not know; and seventy-one per cent answered Russia! This was early in the war; and the possibility of Russian control was then extremely remote. But the statistics nonetheless indicate the gulf between wartime attitudes and those which were necessary for a full-scale counter-offensive against the Russians. In January 1945 the people were asked, "Do you think that we shall get along better with Russia in the future than we did in the past, not so well, or about the same?" Ten per cent did not know; twenty per cent foresaw relations "about the same"; forty-eight per cent envisaged improved relations; and only twenty-two per cent believed relations would deteriorate. Twenty-two per cent was not a very large margin within which politicians could conduct a resolute and forceful foreign policy to counter the emerging Soviet designs. And among those twenty-two per cent—how many were ready to risk war in order to retrieve Yugoslavia or hold Prague?
